O'Hara said that although he was in on the initial discussions, other initiatives have taken priority, and this issue has been put on the back burner.

Reagan said he hadn't had any meetings with student senators in the past month but had talked with department heads of the departments of history, journalism and political science, and asked them to raise the issue of low student attendance at their respective departmental meetings.

O'Hara said he will be interested to see the turnout at Thursday's lecture.

"I think this Thursday will be a good determinant for me," he said. "I wasn't able to attend the last one, and it was an initiative by Zac Cook, so it will be good to see if this is a consistent struggle that we need to address."

He said that if students have concerns about lectures conflicting with class schedules, they can contact him or Student Body Vice President Travis Stryker. O'Hara also encouraged students to send concerns to Reagan.

Reagan said Landon lectures have been scheduled for 10:30 a.m., 11 a.m., 1:30 p.m., 2 p.m. and 7 p.m., and the times don't seem to affect student attendance.

"I think unless you have someone like Jesse Jackson, students aren't aware enough of who the speakers are," Reagan said. "These people don't show up in Salina or Pittsburgh, Kansas. We get to hear people who are in the news in person - for free." I think students here are jaded - they don't realize how lucky we are to have the Landon Lecture Series."

Southeast Missouri buries Wildcats

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

K-State's search for a third weekend starter led to junior Andrew Ehling on Tuesday night.

While Ehling might have locked up the spot with five innings of work, not many other things went the Cats' way in a 9-5 loss to Southeast Missouri State at Tointon Family Stadium.

Indian left fielder Brian Hopkins went 3-for-4 with 3 RBI, all courtesy of a three-run sixth-inning home run, and K-State (12-26) tied a season high with six errors in dropping its second straight.

"We did everything for them and we just can't do that," Coach Mike Clark said. "We aren't that talented to overcome that kind of play."

The Cats' defensive struggles emerged early. Third baseman Zack Saunders' first-inning throwing error and second baseman Marc Chabot's muff on a second-inning grounder didn't directly contribute to Southeast runs, but the extra opportunities would hurt K-State later.

After Indian shortstop Zach Borowiak opened scoring with a sacrifice fly in the first inning, the Wildcats answered with a run in the second.

An inning later, Ehling was touched for two more runs and another K-State error pushed the tally to three.

The Wildcats cut the lead to 3-2 in the fourth with Brett Williams' second RBI, but Clark's club began to self-destruct in the fifth.

A wild pitch and a hit batter tarnished Ehling's final inning, as Southeast added another run to extend the lead to 4-2. The junior was pulled after the fifth.

"He was up the first inning and got hurt a little bit, but after that, I thought he did a good job and mixed his pitches well," Clark said. "But I thought he competed in the zone and gave us a chance. He leaves the game at 4-2, and it's still very much a ballgame."

The score wouldn't stay that way long.

Indian starter Ryan Forsyth (3-0) kept K-State scoreless in the fifth, but Wildcat reliever Allan Woodward wouldn't be so lucky in the sixth.

After surrendering a walk and single to start the frame, Woodward's first offering to Hopkins two batters later left the park in a hurry to put Southeast up 7-2.

"That was huge," Clark said.

"First pitch right over the plate. If it was a solo home run, you go. That happens, but we set the thing up for them with inconsistency in the strike zone." Inconsistency in the field made things easier for the Indians two innings later with the score 7-3.

Senior leads Cats by example

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every team needs a catalyst — a player who ignites his teammates when they need it most.

It's the one who leads by example. It's the steady performer.

For K-State, that player is senior outfielder Pat Maloney.

"He's just a quality baseball player," Coach Mike Clark said. "He's a solid, Division 1, Big 12 baseball player. One of the best."

That's been the book on Maloney his entire career. Hitting .361 as a Wildcat, Maloney was first-team All-Big 12 in 2001 and 2002.

But even the best struggle.

As K-State plowed through a 16-game losing streak, Maloney found himself doing all he could to pull the Cats up.

Sometimes it was too much.

"There was a couple times I was really trying, more than I should, to do stuff I'm not capable of," Maloney said. "My strengths are hitting balls hard up the middle and into gaps. I was getting away from those strengths."

That was a problem for the entire team, Maloney said.

"Everyone is trying almost too hard," he said. "Pitchers are trying to be too fine. They want to do well for the ballclub more than anyone, but they're just trying to do too much right now."

Drafted by the Toronto Blue Jays last summer, Maloney chose instead to return for his senior year. Clark said he's been

Royals' success deserves support

Show me the way. Give me a hand. Sign me up.

I want on the Royals bandwagon.

They're going places, and I want to come.

Normally I detest people like me, but in this case, I think I'll make an exception.

The Royals' record during the last few years negates the standard "fair-weather fans suck" rule. Plus, I went to a game when I was a kid, so I think I still qualify as a follower.

Only the most die-hard have stayed with the team recently. Now that they're off to a hot start, though, the regulars better make room. There's more where I came from.

I haven't forked over for the cap yet, but it's only a couple wins away.

I couldn't have picked a better time to rediscover my Royal roots.

by a hair to win the division and make the playoffs for the first time since 1985.

The Royals have two legit stars — super-slugger Mike Sweeney at first base, and the versatile Carlos Beltran in center field. But they aren't the key to Kansas City's success, and that will prove to be the Royals' greatest asset through the long haul.

When they opened the season a league-best 9-0, the Royals didn't rely on those players. Instead, they won with unknown, consistent pitching. They held opponents down and took advantage of runners in scoring position with clutch hits. It doesn't take superstars to do that.

Beltran didn't even play the first 14 games, while Sweeney missed two and has yet to hit his All-Star stride.

The Royals can't do it on Golfer finds success at Big 12 tournament

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Another day brought another solid performance by one K-State women's golfer, but the Cats struggled again to find consistent play at the Big 12 Championships.

Miranda Smith took the team on her back on Tuesday, firing a 1-under-par 71 in the second round.

Smith sits in a four-way tie for second place heading into the final round today.

"She was a little frustrated with her finish," coach Kristi Knight said.

"She bogied 18, and she let a couple of shots get away from her on the back nine."

"She played a great round," she said. "When she walked off the 18th green, I don't know that she felt that way. She played a super round of golf today, and she should be very proud of herself."

The rest of the team struggled throughout the second day of the tournament. K-State is in sixth place, sitting at 46-over in Columbia, Mo., so far.

Big 12 update

K-State	+46	310
2 Miranda Smith	+5	71
18 Christine Boucher	+11	77
27 Stephanie Limoges	+13	80
38 Karen Quintelier	+17	82
44 Sarah Heffel	+20	84

"Miranda really carried us," Knight said. "She had a great round. Christine (Boucher) shot 77. She couldn't get anything going. She had 13 pars and five bogies and hit close quite a few times, but couldn't get it close."

While Smith played well for most of the day, currently trailing first place by only a stroke, other players struggled with the 6,008-yard Country Club of Missouri. Wet conditions and finding mud on their golf balls plagued the Cats all day.

"This is a difficult golf course, with difficult hole locations," Knight said. "The weather was beautiful, but it's still a very wet golf course, with a lot of mud on the golf ball, which can create some havoc."

But all is not bad for the Cats heading into the final round. Only four strokes separate K-State from fourth place Nebraska. Knight said she is confident her team can catch the Cornhuskers.

"We're right there," Knight said. "Considering we haven't had four scores, I think we can do that. We can't sit back and count on somebody having a fabulous round. Everybody needs to step up and just play some solid golf."

"They fought hard today," she said. "The weather was better today. Hole locations are still difficult, but the scores were a little bit lower today."

Consistency is the key to winning an event in college golf, and Knight said it can get frustrating when one player plays well while others struggle.

"It is frustrating," she said. "Nobody shoots 82 or 84 on purpose. You've got to honestly evaluate your round and learn from the mistakes that you made out there."

"I'm very competitive," Knight said. "But they're competitive also. Some days just aren't your days."

Store's name changes in rebranding

The UPS Store offers lower prices, uniform service with change

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Lower prices, same quality service.

When Mail Boxes Etc. changed its name to reflect its new relationship with UPS this month, those two qualities were packaged in the deal, according to advertisements for the 3,000 stores that are now known as The UPS Store.

In Manhattan, the story is no different.

The store has adopted the new brown-and-gold UPS logo, which was just redesigned last month, and has lowered the prices of UPS shipping rates. Other features offered in the former Mail Boxes Etc. store — postal services, copying, faxing and mail box rental — have remained the same.

Fred Smith, who with his wife, Cheryl, owns the Manhattan store at 1228 West-loop, said a main motivation for the change was because of the name recognition.

"Our business volume has increased," he said. "UPS is a recognized name, and the change is reflecting that."

UPS announced in February its plan to rebrand the stores, and the owners of all but 300 of the 3,300 shops nationwide agreed to the changes.

"The main thrust of the change is we can provide lower prices on a large majority of our products because of the help from UPS," Smith said.

Although the store can now provide lower prices, the focus on customer service will remain the same, he said.

"What we do has not changed at all," Smith said. "We always have had a high level of customer service, and that will continue."

What will change is formalized training programs through UPS for the store's employees.

"As a franchise owner, you do your own training when you could," Smith said. "With UPS, it will be a more sophisticated level of training."

Smith said his store has consistently had high levels of customer service, even winning several awards for overall store performance, but he does welcome the additional training.

"It will allow customers to have a more consistent experience between stores. Before, if you had a bad experience at one store, you might not visit the same company in a different location," he said.

"It will be a minor adjustment for us, but it will allow for more uniform service among stores."

Students win national financial planning championship

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Three students recently defeated representatives from about 70 other public universities to win the national collegiate financial planning championship — bringing home three full-ride scholarships and more than $10,000.

Jamie Breeden, Lucas Bucl and Wes Uhl, seniors in family financial planning, represented K-State at the competition sponsored by American Express Financial Advisors, the Certified Financial Planner Board of Standards and the Financial Planning Association.

John Grable, adviser for the personal financial planning program, said this is K-State's first win since 2000 and its fourth consecutive trip to the finals. He said this year's group was picked to represent K-State from 85 undergraduate students in the program.

"This team was chosen for its involvement," he said. "These three students really have a passion for financial planning."

He said that once the team was established, students immediately began working on the three-part competition.

First, competitors from the 70 universities completed a comprehensive financial plan for a hypothetical family in just one month.

For the K-State students, this meant putting in more than 150 hours in 28 days. However, the 125-page recommendation was enough to earn a seat among the top six entries and tickets to Huntington Beach, Calif., to compete in the finals April 8-11.

"This competition was a good way to apply all the knowledge we gained over the course of our curriculum," Breeden said.

"We do have a seminar class that we put a financial plan together, but I thought this competition would be the most challenging because we had to put a plan together over the course of a month, which is more realistic."

Bucl said the group's hard work in the initial phases of the competition paid off.

"It was definitely a lot of hard work," he said. "We weren't allowed to use any software other than Microsoft Word and Excel — no financial planning software or anything like that, but it was good experience."

Grable said the competition's intensity increased once students arrived at the finals.

"The scenario changed, so they had to go back and rework their case and prepare for their presentation," he said. "They get them all in a big room, send them off to the hotel room with a laptop and basically have all night to make the changes."

Grable said the group then presented its cases and participated in a game show-like competition, the "How do you know challenge."

After winning the overall competition and the game show, the K-State team received a $10,000 scholarship for the personal financial planning program, about $900 each and a surprise no one expected — three scholarships to complete their master's degrees at the College of Financial Planning in Denver, Colo. Grable said the scholarships will pay for tuition, books and supplies.

Uhl said he was shocked. "What they had already provided was enough, but then it was taken one step further," he said. "It changed my future plans as far as my education."

Uhl, Bucl and Breeden plan on using the scholarships and pursuing their master's degrees.

Bucl said he also made some invaluable contacts by participating in the competition.

"I talked to some team members that won the competition, and they told me it was a great opportunity — not only for the experience, but to meet people at American Express and make some connections there, which is definitely a benefit and weighed my decision to compete."

Uhl agreed. "I feel lucky that my field of choice provides an experience such as this one for students," he said.

"I highly encourage students to participate in these types of events — they are life- and career-altering."

Internet helps with health care access

Telemedicine provides services via computer

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Every year, a number of students in the Manhattan-Ogden USD 383 school district cannot attend school due to illness.

Starting this fall, however, some students will have a better chance of accessing health care as a result of the TeleKidcare program.

TeleKidcare uses telemedicine, a method of delivering health care to patients via interactive computer, camera, and special software, to help parents access health care for their school children as well as reduce the time a child spends out of the classroom and the parent away from work.

Dee McKee, director of special education and special services for USD 383, said the Geary County Health Council, along with Deborah Johnston, made the TeleKidcare possible in Manhattan.

"With their help and the help of the Riley County participants, this program has become a reality in our area," McKee said.

Johnston, executive director for the Geary County Health Council, said she applied for a grant for the TeleKidcare project through the KU Medical Center in December 2002.

Johnston said that after she received the grant, it was decided to include Riley and Pottawatomie counties in the project.

She said the program will be called the Flint Hills TeleKidcare so it will be inclusive of the three communities.

"I wanted a project that would benefit the child,"

Johnston said. "This will increase the speed of the healing process and decrease the time the child is away."

McKee said the program will be implemented in the Northview and Ogden schools with the opportunity to serve the students with a parent's consent.

McKee said telemedicine has been available in Kansas for more than 10 years.

In 1995, The University of Kansas Medical Center established the Center for TeleMedicine and TeleHealth (CTT). Two years later, CTT broadened its attention to cover families with school children who may not be able to access health care.

Johnston said the nurses involved in TeleKidcare started their training April 16. The program will be working with Pawnee Mental Health to expand TeleKidcare services, she said.

"The component from Pawnee Mental Health will be to provide a behavioral specialist or child psychologist to diagnose problems like ADHD or depression," Johnston said.

Graham Rose, senior pediatrician at the Pediatrics Associates of Manhattan, said he, along with five other pediatricians, will be the physicians examining the children as part of the TeleKidcare program here in Manhattan.

"Our office has been serving kids for many years," Rose said. "This is another way to improve medical care for a population that may not have access to health care."

McKee said the benefits that the TeleKidcare program offers will be valuable for those it will serve.

"This program will make health care available for those students who need it," McKee said.

"It keeps kids in school while eliminating the spread of illnesses and emergency visits."

positions in national scientific and professional organizations.

Coffman served on the Council on Academic Affairs Executive Committee of the National Association of State Universities and Land Grant Colleges through 2000.

Coffman cited the increase in student scholarships, the improvement in diversity, the addition of the Salina campus and the increase in enrollment as some of the biggest changes during his time as provost.

"There have been a lot of policy changes, creating a system where the individual strengths of research faculty to maximize their talents and utilize their knowledge to create a collective outcome that's more beneficial to the university," he said.

Individuals' abilities to contribute more to the university has been the largest improvement, he said, and while he knows he will return to work in the College of Veterinary Medicine, he currently is concerned with fulfilling his duty as provost.

"I've enjoyed it immensely," he said, "and I'm looking forward to the next year."

their own, though. They will benefit from a very weak division.

So far, KC has feasted on the hapless Indians, the disappointing White Sox and the hilarious Detroit Tigers.

The only decent team in the division is the Twins, but they are fresh off a six-game spanking courtesy of the Yankees and are likely questioning their will to live as they face the Royals this week.

Is it for real, though? That is the question echoing across my mind. Now that I have declared allegiance, did I chain myself to a sinking ship?

I don't think so. A 9-0 start doesn't mean anything in the long run, but even after swallowing a few tough losses, Kansas City seems unfazed.

Raul Ibanez is emerging as a possible third slugger, while key players Joe Randa and Brent Mayne are filling in nicely, getting hits when it counts.

The team has to remember what this feels like. There are times when they lose a few in a row, but they can't get down.

They have to remember what got it done - clutch hitting and solid pitching.

They can't give up. I have too much at stake for that to happen.

I can't let my team become a loser again, especially if I shell out cash for the hat.

instrumental in helping K-State through its slump.

"It's important for the seniors to understand and teach these other kids exactly how important certain things are," Clark said.

One of those lessons is sticking together.

"It's tough," Maloney said. "We're all trying to get through it. Everyone is struggling and everyone's wanting to do well."

And, once again, Maloney is doing it.

Against Southeast Missouri State, Maloney went 2-for-4 from the plate, singling in the sixth inning and belting a solo home run to left-center in the eighth. It was his first home run since March 26 against Wichita State.

Tuesday marked the 68th game in 70 that Maloney reached base safely.

Clark has seen a change in the way Maloney approaches the plate in recent games.

"Right now, he's doing a real good job of not chasing as much and forcing things," Clark said.

According to Clark, Maloney is playing within himself.

"I'm hitting the ball pretty well," Maloney said. "As long as I keep hitting the ball hard, it'll help."

eighth - including a two-error debacle on one play - to put the game away for good.

"The eighth inning was just ugly," Clark said.

The Wildcats finished with double-digit hits for only the second time in the last six games, but K-State's struggles handling the ball on defense were more important than offensive potency.

"We had some good things going on late in the ballgame, but we were already six runs down, so it makes it awfully tough," Clark said.

Ehling (1-1) took the loss after allowing four runs on eight hits.

Nevertheless, Clark said Ehling pitched well enough to earn another look, perhaps this weekend against Texas in Austin.

"He threw well," he said. "We didn't want to throw him seven or eight innings and then not be able to throw him Sunday."

Parking Public Forum Manhattan

A public forum to discuss the 2003-2004 proposed parking regulation changes will be held April 24th from 3:30 to 4:30 unless completed sooner. The meeting will be held in the Big 12 room, K-State Student Union.

Changes Include:

- A wording change to make clear when parking is only allowed in lots specified by displayed permit.
- A wording change to make clear the refund policy.
- A change that does not allow retirees to have reserved stalls.
- A paragraph that allows the suspension of parking privileges for stealing permits, illegal disabled placards, etc., with appeals sent to the SGA Student Tribunal.
- A change in reserved stall rules, changing 10 hour stalls to 12 hours stalls, with intent of reducing 24 hour stalls. No fee increase is proposed with the change from 10 to 12 hour stalls, would occur with any other future fee increase.

HUNGRY BEHIND THE WHEEL

Eating while driving can cause spills, car accidents

By J. Scott Bowman
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coffee in one hand, a bagel in the other. A sharp turn ahead causes the steaming coffee to spill everywhere. There is a split second to respond. What do you do?

Eating and driving can cause accidents, and there are consequences for inattentive driving, said Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the Riley County Police Department.

"When you're eating and driving, you are driving inattentively," Moldrup said. "If you're eating something and you spill it, you are going to have a reaction. If it's hot you're going to react quickly. The point is that you don't have your full-time attention on the road."

Moldrup said that if you cause an accident due to inattentive driving, it is considered a driving infraction, and you can get fined.

"Inattentive driving can include talking on the cell phone, talking to a friend, putting on make-up, reading and eating," Moldrup said. "It's something that takes your attention off of the road."

"It's impossible to legislate against eating, though, because that would include eating candy and gum. It would be the same if someone was eating a big bowl of chili."

Cities have a set of standard ordinances that the state gives them and each city generally chooses which ones to adopt, Moldrup said. He said most cities, including Manhattan, adopt the inattentive driving ordinance due to the fact that it is a common driving infraction and often causes accidents.

When your hands are occupied by eating, you can face more problems than just an infraction, said Trooper Jeremy Harwood of the Kansas Highway Patrol.

"It's a problem when your hands and eyes are taken away from the wheel and road," Harwood said. "If a deer crosses the road, you can't drive around it if you're eating and driving with your knees. People need to pay more attention when they drive."

Topeka is another city that has similar ordinances against inattentive driving, said Lt. John Sidwell of the Topeka Police Department.

"We have them because they're important traffic infractions," Sidwell said. "It's important because people need to give attention to the roadway."

Moldrup said that there are several reasons why people take risks while driving. He said the main factor is the fact that society has become fast paced.

"We're an in-a-hurry-gotta-go-not-a-problem-fast-paced-on-the-go society," Moldrup said. "We don't want to stop and eat. So, that's why we eat on the go."

Harwood said he wishes there were a state statute for inattentive driving. He said that the ordinances that cities have are a good step in the right direction.

"The problem is, everyone is in a rush," Harwood said. "Everyone wants to get stuff done while driving. That includes reading the news, driving while drinking coffee, watching TV with some of the new DVD players. But you can't have a five-course meal behind the wheel."

Harwood said that people tend to feel invincible in their automobiles. But, he said, nothing could be further from the truth.

"People who have been driving for years tend to not worry about things as much," Harwood said.

"It takes just that one time, of an accident, to actually make it stick."

Eclectic brass band brings 'Beatles to Bach' to McCain Auditorium

By Tony Herrman
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Canadian Brass, one of the biggest names in brass music, is coming to McCain Auditorium on Sunday afternoon.

Thom Jackson, marketing director at McCain, said Canadian Brass has a very eclectic repertoire.

"They play music by Bach and Handel. They're very well known for Baroque music, but they also play the St. Louis blues," Jackson said.

Sunday's performance will include tributes to Glen Miller and Tommy Dorsey, as well as pieces from comedy-composer P.D.Q. Bach, he said.

The band's performance will be based on its latest album, "Amazing Brass," which highlights the 33 years of the band, Ryan Anthony, trumpet player, said.

"There's a lot of variety. We're going to provide music for everybody," Anthony said.

"We will be playing everything from Bach to the Beatles."

Music professor Gary Mortenson will give a lecture prior to Canadian Brass' performance about the history of the brass quintet.

It is designed to allow the audience to fully appreciate what they are going to see, he said.

"They've probably been one of the top brass quintets for over three decades," Mortenson said.

"The show will be very enjoyable even for people not familiar with brass music."

Canadian Brass was formed 33 years ago in Toronto, Ontario. Two of the founding members, Chuck Daellenbach and Eugene Watts are still part of the band.

Even though only two of the current members of the band are Canadian, the band still rehearses in Toronto.

Anthony said he has not performed in Kansas during his three years in the band, although he was sure that Canadian Brass had performed in Manhattan during their 33-year run.

Anthony said he always looks forward to getting to play somewhere new. He also said that college venues only comprise 15 percent of Canadian Brass' performances.

Despite the fact that so few of the band's performances are at colleges, Anthony said that the majority of Canadian Brass' fans are college-aged.

"We get a lot of music students because, by the time you get to college, Canadian Brass is a name you've heard many times," Anthony said. "Certainly we have a lot of middle-aged fans too, but to look out into the audience and see the future of music is very encouraging for us."

Anthony said he first heard about Canadian Brass in high school, and it was a childhood dream come true when he received a call three years ago, from the band asking him to join.

"It's beyond an honor," he said. "Every night is still fresh."

■ K-State Symphony Band will perform at 7:30 tonight at McCain Auditorium.

IN BRIEF

The Associated Press

American Music Awards organizers plan to shift to earlier date

American Music Awards organizers plan to shift the show from its usual January date to November of this year, cutting the nominations window by about two months, a spokesman for the show said.

Ratings were down for the American Music Awards this year. The show had just 12.9 million viewers — the smallest audience since Nielsen Media Research began keeping records for the show in 1974 — down from the 16 million who saw it in 2002.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Ed Klimek

Former mayor of Manhattan

1. What would you like to be having for dinner tonight?

"I would start out with my favorite food — artichokes, this time of year. Then, let's have a grilled hamburger for a day like today."

2. What is in your CD player right now or who is your favorite artist?

"I just bought this. This is a flashback. Todd Rundgren. He's a guy from the '70s. Very neat. Famous hit song - 'We Got to Get You a Woman.'"

3. What kind of car do you drive?

"I drive a 2003, brand-new Honda van. And at the other end, I have a 1975 Nova. I am open for restoration ideas to take care of the rust problems."

4. What was the last movie you saw?

"Holes." It was really neat to go through the fantasy story. The book is really popular and the movie is not just a young-people movie. I liked the popcorn, too."

5. What is your must-see TV show?

"I am the world's worst TV watcher. My claim to fame is I haven't watched any prime time TV, except for sports, in at least eight years. I just don't watch TV. It just doesn't work for me."

6. What is your favorite place to eat out?

"I just went out with some people last night at Hibachi Hut. It's a great place. The atmosphere is real laid back."

7. Who is your idol and why?

"I like people that bring other people together in a common cause. I like Mickey Mouse. Mickey brings all this joy to people. I think it's cool that you have an image like that that makes people happy and carefree."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?

"I'm pretty basic. I just like beer. The first beer you can really taste what it is, the second one you don't really know what it is. It's got to be ice cold and in a glass. Then it's good."

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?

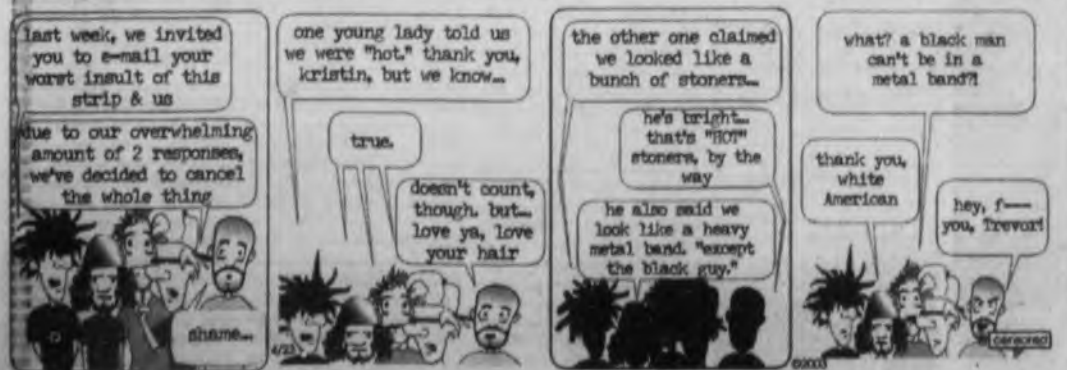

"I was the last person in Nichols Hall when it burned. I was the last person in there when the fire roared. I was the program director at KSDB. I was trying to save the radio DJ that was on the air that night. The fireman escorted me out of the building."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?

"I don't know if I actually cheated on a test. I might have written something on my hand once or twice."

program, "Ashleigh Banfield: On Location," from July to October 2002. The program included a stop in Manhattan in August 2002, where she interviewed K-State experts on protecting the nation's food supply from bioterrorism.

"She first came to our attention when she was hosting 'Ashleigh Banfield: On Location,'" Reagan said. "She talked to professors from Manhattan about what K-State is doing to fight agroterrorism. She has covered topics that are relevant to our community, as well as communities around the world."

Reagan said he is unsure what topic Banfield will speak on, but he thinks it might be about the war in Iraq from the perspective of a journalist.

"It makes it more interesting when we don't know the topic,"

Reagan said. "It is a good thing, because if the speaker gives you the topic beforehand, it usually means they are giving a canned speech they have done 10 times before."

"With Ashleigh Banfield, it will be a surprise when she starts in, but I imagine it will be about the news coverage of the war in Iraq. It is an unusual war from the point of a journalist, and her perspective will be interesting."

to pull the wool over the public's eye by simply manipulating the timing of revenue and expenditures from one year to another."

Kearns said the budget problem is not as complicated as the state officials would like the public to believe — the budget calls for more expenditures than revenue.

"They're just not sitting down, not doing it," Kearns said. "They're just dancing around that."

The Legislature has proposed ideas for filling the budget gap, including legalizing gambling to generate revenue, delaying payments to school districts and tax refunds and selling bonds that it would pay back at a later date.

All of these ideas, Kearns said, avoid the basic problem of spending more than the state is making.

Kearns suggested a review of all agencies and programs that receive state funding, including the education system.

"There should be no sacred cows at the state level," he said. "If I were at the state level, I would make lobbyists for education come in and justify every expense."

The only true solution to the deficit, Kearns said, would be to either reduce spending or increase tax revenue. Expenditures could be reduced by rejecting the status quo and making large programs like education — which receives more than half of the state's overall expenditures — justify their expenses.

"In order to do the job, each department must be looked at critically," Kearns said.

The Legislature will reconvene April 30 after a recess of nearly a month, and Kearns said that the body should address the budget immediately upon its return to the Statehouse.

"They're just not sitting down and facing issues square-on," he said.

Kearns said there had been no response from other commissions Monday, but that he expects favorable reception from around the state.

"We heard the same sentiment from other commissions," he said.

"A lot of us feel like we're balancing the books for the state, and we're sick of it."

Language program applicants decrease

English Language Program experiences lower enrollment

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Applications for K-State's English Language Program are down this year, but officials are hopeful to see a rebound.

Thirty students applied to the program this semester, down from 61 in spring 2001.

"It is concerning to us," said Mary Wood, director of English Language Program. "There seems to be an uncertainty right now with world events that is discouraging a number of international students from seeking entry into the program."

The program provides English instruction to international students through two choices.

The first, the Intensive English class, provides English instruction to students who choose to enroll for language training only or as a study abroad experience.

The second, the University English class, provides instruction to students who are qualified to begin university work but do not meet English proficiency standards for the university.

Administrators, Student Senate to examine tuition tonight

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

University administrators will be giving a presentation regarding K-State's tuition process and the proposals for various student-centered enhancements at the Student Senate meeting tonight.

Student Body President John O'Hara said administration will be presenting the tuition proposal for the 2003-04 academic year, as well as discussing the process the university has been in. The Kansas Board of Regents reported Thursday that K-State's tuition increase will be 20 percent, beginning this fall.

Administrators also will be finalizing student-enhancement proposals after weeks of discussion with senators from the executive and academic affairs committees.

Enhancements include those allocated through Student Senate. "We've given them our recommendation, and they'll be presenting this," O'Hara said. "It's the same presentation they'll be making at the Board of Regents meeting next month."

O'Hara said the meeting will allow feedback between students and administration.

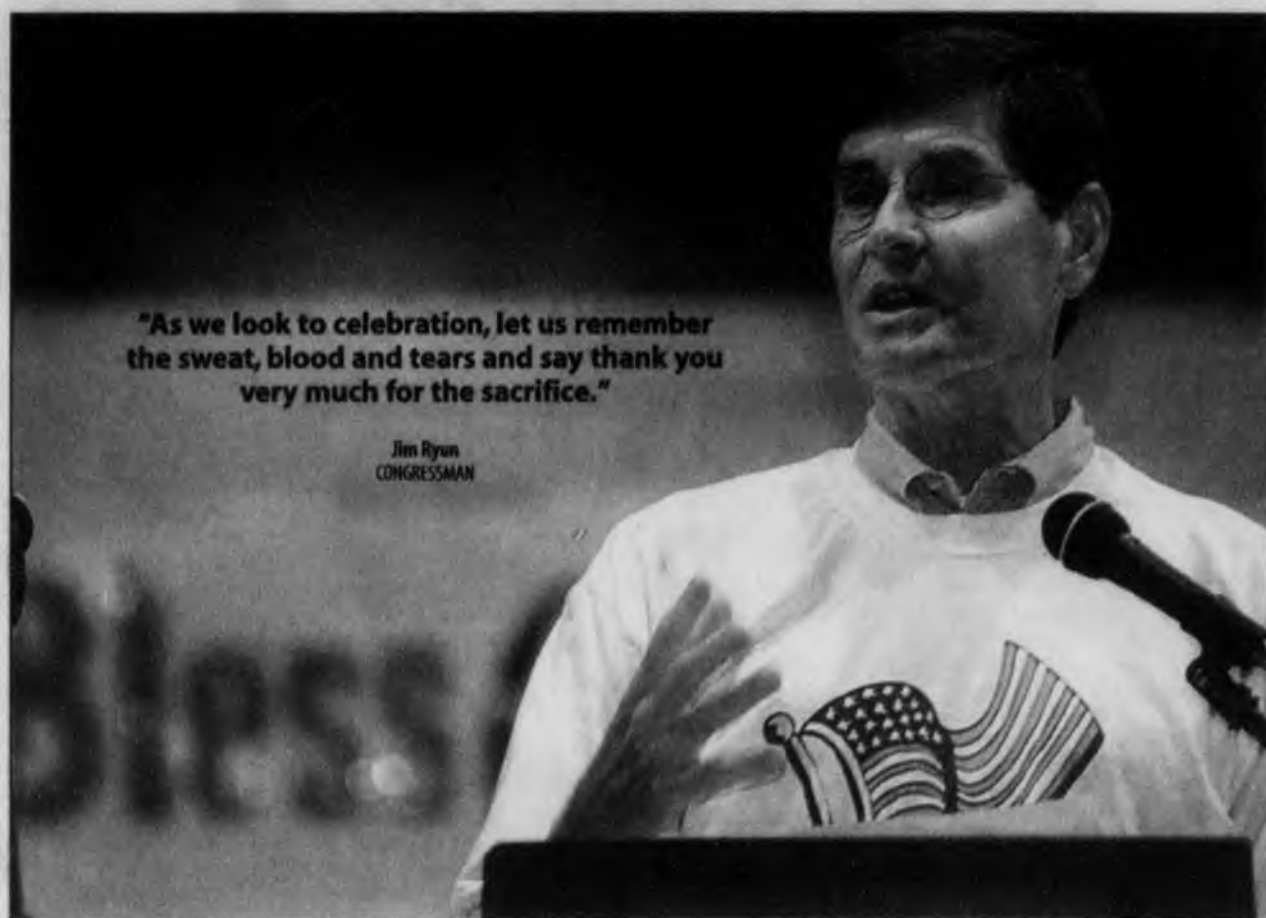

"I think it is important to have the opportunity for students to give feedback to the administration," he said. "It's important to hear the administration and their goals and the administration to hear what our goals and mission and plans are."

The student body is invited to attend the meeting and offer feedback to university administration.

"We encourage students outside of Student Senate to come and hear what the administration have to say regarding the tuition increase and the way we'll be allocating out our tuition increase," O'Hara said.

"I think it will be good for the entire student body to know what initiatives we have recommended to the administration."

Citizens, officials gather in support of soldiers

It can't rain on this parade. That's what about 100 participants proved as they attended the parade and rally Wednesday night to honor the U.S. military.

"The heart of the people is still in it," said June Gifford, a participant at the rally. The troops have gone through sandstorms. I think we can handle a little rain."

Those who attended the rally gathered together under the roof of the Pavilion in City Park.

Mayor Mark Taussig said he was glad to see people out and added that the rainy weather didn't discourage participants.

"Our troops have defended our freedom in all kinds of weather, so it's not that hard for us to be here today. Besides, we could use the rain," he said.

The family of fallen Wellsville soldier, Jacob Butler attended the rally. Butler died in late March. He was the first Kansas soldier killed in action in this war.

The rally began with Joe Butler, twin brother of Jacob Butler, leading the Pledge of Allegiance.

James Butler, Jacob's father, said his son would have been proud of the rally.

"He got a lot of freedom and was proud to serve his country," Butler said.

"These soldiers lay their lives on the line every day, and they want to be remembered."

Sheryl Weston, a Manhattan resident, said her son, LCPL Chris Weston of the Marines, is in Iraq, although she doesn't know exactly where. She said she is proud her son serves as a Marine.

"No matter what the reason for the war is, the job they do protects us, and I couldn't be prouder," she said.

Former Manhattan mayor Ed Klinek bows his head in prayer at the start of a rally held in the City Park Pavilion Wednesday night to honor the U.S. military. About 100 people participated in the parade and march.

Congressman Jim Ryun and Kansas Attorney General Phill Kline each delivered speeches to the rain-soaked audience.

Kline said that while the Iraqi people have been liberated, the U.S. military will work to rebuild Iraq.

"Let all those who question America's cause witness what America does now for the people of Iraq," he said.

As the introduction of the speakers began, master of ceremonies, Mayor Mark Taussig read a letter from Kansas Governor Kathleen Sebelius.

Umpire job requires game knowledge, objectivity

Students appreciate schedule, personal aspect of campus job

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being a softball umpire for Recreational Services means more than just calling balls and strikes. This campus job provides a way to meet new people and have fun.

John Wondra, assistant director for intramurals, said there are two meetings set up at the beginning of each season for anyone who is interested in umpiring. The meetings are two hours long and consist of reviewing rules, field clinics and different aspects of responsibilities.

"The training clinics cover as much material as possible but don't go into great detail," Wondra said.

Eighty-nine umpires started the season, but after a few weeks, the umpires were evaluated and were cut back to 56.

The cuts are based on a test that is given during the clinics and the performance of the umpires during the first two weeks of the season.

Darrin Fulton, sophomore in criminology, has been umpiring for two years. He said some of the responsibilities include officiating the game, making sure the teams keep score correctly, putting in and taking out the bases, and getting teams signed in.

"I like the job as long as people don't gripe too much," Fulton said. "I have had to kick a couple of people out for verbal abuse."

Angie Hasemann, freshman in nutrition and exercise science, said some of the advantages of the job are the good pay, picking one's own schedule and meeting a lot of people.

The salary for starting umpires is $6.50. For each season that an umpire returns, salary increases by 25 cents.

"This job is a lot of fun, and it is pretty easy money for the work, but sometimes the weather can be a disadvantage," Hasemann said.

During the season, there is a meeting every two weeks to go through rules and responsibilities. These meetings go into more detail than the initial clinics, Wondra said.

Hasemann said umpires have a big say in games.

"As an umpire, you are really responsible to make sure that the players are good sports, and that the games are being administered in a professional way," she said.

Speaker stresses liberty protection

ACLU director says Americans should know about their rights

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Americans should be aware of their constitutional rights, a speaker said Wednesday night at Forum Hall.

"Given our history, should we be concerned about our present state of civil liberties?" Anthony Romero asked his audience. "The answer is yes."

Romero, executive director of American Civil Liberties Union, said it is the beginning of the 21st century, and America is at war against global terrorism.

"This war on terrorism will be a drawn-out conflict because freedom cannot defend itself," he said. "If we allowed our cherished values to be eroded by the terrorists, then the terrorists have won."

He gave many examples of past instances where the government has tried to take away the rights of immigrant citizens.

"As World War I ended, bombs went off all over the country. We were fearful of the enemy overseas," Romero said.

"Now fast-forward to the second World War. After the Japanese bombed Pearl Harbor, many Japanese-Americans were detained."

Romero said many of these Japanese-Americans were American citizens and had not committed any crime.

He also said the number detained made up for almost 90 percent of the Japanese-American population at that time.

"Roosevelt's Executive Order violated the rights of many citizens," Romero said.

After citing historical examples of civil liberties violations, Romero asked what Americans can learn from history.

"One lesson would be that we need to be guided by our values and not by our fears," he said.

Immigrants were the first to experience limitations on freedoms after Sept. 11, Romero said, because society was more concerned about security than constitutional rights.

"After 9/11, the FBI combed cities for people of Arab or South Asian background," he said. "They detained about 200 people within the first week. After November 8, they refused to give the number. Many of those detained had not even been arrested."

Romero said these people were detained or arrested wrongly, and the government refused to release their names to the ACLU. The names were finally released to the ACLU by embassies in other countries.

Attorney General John Ashcroft began proposing many new programs as part of the Patriot Act to protect America after Sept. 11, Romero said.

"The government is abusing the powers of the Patriot Act," he said. "They have exploited people's fear and anxiety," he said.

He said citizens need to ask themselves why these initiatives are even being proposed in the first place.

Joshua Felts, senior in economics and history, became a member of ACLU after hearing of such provisions that could take away rights.

"I've been a member of ACLU for about a month," he said. "I joined for the reasons that Romero spoke about."

Felts said many Americans aren't aware of some of the provisions that may limit civil liberties.

"Most Americans live complacent lives. They don't know, or they don't care," he said.

Felts said he tries to stay current with government issues.

"Especially the ones that pertain to my freedom," he said. "I think citizens should be more involved and write to their representatives — let them know what their views are."

Romero said citizens have a right to question what the government is doing.

"We have a responsibility, as well. If we dedicate ourselves to end these violations, the pendulum will move. We will have a liberty embraced by a broader spectrum of citizens," he said. "I need your help."

Hale Library budget funding decreases

Dean of libraries says maintaining current open hours important goal

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

All Hale Library accounts are below book value.

However, Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said he realizes library access is the most important to students, so he will try to maintain hours.

Hobrock described the 2003 fiscal year as a train wreck, as the library budget was reduced by $835,059.

Library hours were cut by 25 percent to try to offset the reduction of state revenues totaling $21 million to the university and more than $1 million to the library budget.

After students made a case that their needs were not being met with the reduced hours, most of the hours were restored, Hobrock said.

For the 2004 fiscal year, the library budget is potentially facing a total of $700,000 in reductions.

Although no decision is final to reduce any particular amount and won't be decided until the Legislature makes a decision, said John Struve, interim associate vice president for administration and finance.

"Right now, we're just planning for the worst-case scenario," he said.

There is now a proposal of $650,000 to be added to the budget annually to try to offset the reduction in state revenues, he said. Funds from the proposed increase to the library budget will originate from the tuition increase, Provost James Coffman said.

However, Struve said the tuition increase is not intended to offset the appropriation reductions from the state.

"What we hope is a combination of increased tuition and increased funding will offset the reduction in funding because we compare very poorly with our five peer universities."

The financial situation the libraries are facing is a reflection of the economy and the three-year downturn of the stock market, Hobrock said.

"There are two issues the library faces: providing hours for the library to be open is the larger issue dollar-wise and how the cuts in the budget will affect the renewal of subscription of journals," Coffman said.

As a result, Hobrock said the library will not buy any new books, and the annual journal subscriptions will be dramatically reduced.

"We're in the middle of a very large reduction of journal subscriptions because they inflate approximately 10 percent per year; $850,000 will be cut back, which is a quarter of the total currently acquired," Hobrock said.

The second most important thing to students, Hobrock said, is the accessibility to computers.

Coffman allocated enough funds to the library to replace half of all the public terminals this year and the other half next year, he said.

"What people need to realize is that these times are of great uncertainty, and they need to look at what's going on — war and terrorism. We're at a more uncertain state than we have been in a long time," Hobrock said.

"We don't know, what's going to happen, but we're doing strategic planning to do things we think are most important."

Need a magic wand to graduate on time?

Well, it may not be magic, but summer school at Wichita State can do some pretty incredible things — like make an entire semester disappear in as little as two weeks. It's not smoke and mirrors, just an easy, convenient way to get in a class or two while you're home between semesters. And as always, credits earned at WSU are easily transferable to K-State. So, take summer school at Wichita State, and in the blink of an eye you'll be closer to graduation and still have plenty of time to enjoy summer before heading back to Manhattan.

Enrollment is now open,
so check out WSU's schedule of courses on-line at www.wichita.edu/schedule or call 316-978-3090 to get a copy by mail and to find out how you can register on-line.

Thinkers, Doers,
Movers & Shockers

TO THE POINT

Tuition funds should be used as promised to K-State students

When students were hit with a 25-percent tuition increase last year, the money was promised to go toward making K-State one of the best universities in the nation.

Instead, some of that money went to fill the gaps left by a faltering state budget.

Here comes tuition increase number two — a 20-percent increase for the 2003-04 academic year. Once again, students are promised that the revenue will go toward university enhancement.

Hale Library, however, is requesting $650,000 from the tuition revenue to offset state budget reductions, which would mean ensuring the restoration of hours and keeping journal subscriptions.

No matter what the financial situation, tuition revenue must be used to fulfill the promises made to its students. Although budget cuts are difficult for all university departments, we must continue to move forward instead of perpetually making up for lost funds.

Students were promised their money would not be used where the state failed — that promise must be kept.

THE PATRIOT'S BLIND EYE

Patriotism present outside of pro-war agenda

In a time when America is more concerned about spreading democracy than practicing it, it is more important than ever to wear symbolic colors, adopt a bald eagle, register to vote and practice your stars and stripes more than your P's and Q's.

Uncle Sam is being asked to step down and make room for Uncle Bush Jr. while brisk nationalism has finally started to come to fruition through the likes of The Patriot Act, compassionate conservatism, the Department of Homeland Security and freedom fries a la carte.

But is this truly the makings of being pro-American — a patriot?

No. In fact, the reigns of jingoism have taken hold in the hearts and minds of many misguided Americans. According to my thesaurus, the unfortunate mentality of fanatical patriotism and unchecked governmental support mistaken as, "taking one for the team" has become a reality.

Nationalism is defined by a supreme interest in your country, isolationism and unilateral action with respect for national over international interests. Thus describing North Korea to a tee, and with patriotism being a synonym according to Merriam-Webster, what's to separate America's yearnings from such a totalitarian and oppressive regime and its "Dear Leader"?

Uncle Bush Jr. can now listen to all your phone calls and read your e-mail at leisure. No search or arrest warrants are required if someone thinks you're a shady character. You have the right for a military tribunal and to remain silent, because no one will see you in the blotter section of the Collegian. But as long as it keeps potentially dangerous folk off our streets, we can see our way past this minor inconvenience.

In America's quest to stamp out fascism and usher in the amiable hand of democracy, America too often is too eager to mold and form harassed countries, quashing not only the oppressor but often times those who suffer as well. We are catching the wheat and chaff but unable to stop the milk from running through its fingers.

The laws of physics tell us that if we hold a scoop of ice cream in our hand, the ice cream will warm and our palm will cool, eventually reaching a compromising equilibrium in temperature.

So is it safe to say that while America is reforming others that they in turn are also reforming America?

Absolutely. The feigned blind eye is where America derives its hypocrisy. Take away our civil liberties. The People's Tribune calls it "our right to question and critique a devouring capitalist system," and for the sake of national security we'll sign off on it as a necessary evil.

But any violation of civil liberties abroad is met with staunch criticism and a desire to show the way to a better system as Winston Churchill describes, "democracy, the worst form of government except for all the others."

In an oppressed state, protesting is looked down upon and sometimes even forbidden. How is that any different than how many Americans viewed recent anti-war protests? Who's the patriot here? Aren't people who question and protest, celebrating their rights and their country, just as patriotic as those who choose to take up arms and defend their country?

To those of you who beg to differ I challenge you to be a true patriot. Whether you wage a campaign of words, ideas, bows or arrows, none are less devoted than the other.

But I'm with Owen Wilson, "I don't know karate but I do know crazy, and I will use it."

Peace ad disturbs reader

Editor,

I have been at K-State for seven years, reading the Collegian faithfully each day. I have never been as disappointed with the paper as I was Monday.

I was disappointed with the very large advertisement on Page 9, titled "The Peace Movement isn't about Peace...". I recognize that this is an advertisement — it is about money.

It is not the nature of the advertisement that I find most disturbing — after all, both sides of the "issue" deserve a voice.

It is the size of the advertisement to which I take the greatest offense. The sheer size of one side of this controversial issue is disturbing.

Advertisements are put in newspapers because some company — in this case the Center for Study of Popular Culture — paid to place it in the paper.

I also understand that we are in a time where money is tight, even for the Collegian. I hope the money offered to run the advertisement was just too good to pass up — or that the individual that contacted the Collegian made it hard to say no. I hope that the appearance of the advertisement is not a product of poor judgment.

Maybe I am speaking too soon and tomorrow an advertisement the same size will appear for "Stupid White Men."

Decisions are made to accept or reject advertisements, about the size and content of those advertisements.

Readers come to associate the content and presentation of advertisements with the news media source that displays them. When messages take up half of a page — as is the case of the peace movement advertisement — it is difficult not to assume that the news media source that displays it does not also support the message or content of the advertisement.

These are sensitive times. Those that make decisions about supporting one side of an issue or the other, must consider the sensitivities of their readership. I know that I will be considerate of my sensitivities tomorrow when I walk by and do not pick up a Collegian.

Easter break has no place at state university

Editor,

This is in response to the Fourum entry on Monday, "I don't understand why we don't get any days off for Easter. This school is full of a bunch of hell-bound atheists."

This is very disturbing. First of all, if you don't celebrate Easter it means you don't practice Christianity. It does not mean you are atheist. There is a big difference. Wake up. There are many religions out there, not just Christianity.

Religion is something personal about how you interpret the world and creation. Most religions have a holiday that symbolizes rebirth. It is sad that people use religion and beliefs to discriminate.

About getting days off for Easter: If you look at Easter as a religious holiday, then it is common sense that a state university is not going to be out of session. Are you aware of how many religions are represented in the United States or at K-State alone? Above all, the holidays that all religions celebrate? We would never be in session.

However, if you look at Easter as a cultural holiday of the United States, never mind its origin, then the university treats it like any other cultural holiday. We are not off for Halloween, Valentine's Day, St. Patrick's Day or any other such occasion.

There are many people who have beliefs that differ from my own. However, I respect what they believe.

Something to think about: Imagine for a minute that there is one right religion. What if you were practicing the wrong one?

Wouldn't it be nice to face that God on judgment day and at least say that you respected its religion and people even though their beliefs were different than yours?

Think about it.

Landon Lecture series not welcoming to outsiders

Dear Editor,

Another reason that more students and faculty may not be attending the Landon Lectures is that most of the best seats are reserved for Landon patrons and the news media.

I attended Landon Lectures for many years before I was ever able to sit on the main floor of McCain Auditorium. When people arrive on time or a little early, only to find the main floor closed, it does not send a welcoming message.

When it becomes necessary to arrive very early to obtain a good seat, that necessarily involves a conflict with yet another class. It is easy for many potential listeners to come away with the impression that the important audience is the donors and the press, not the students and faculty.

Personally, I have found other K-State lecture series, like the Lou Douglas, Dorothy Thompson and University Convocations series, more welcoming than the Landon Lectures.

Enrollment practices need improvement

Editor,

There are lots of great things about K-State, but what's the worst thing about K-State?

There's parking, of course, but we history professors can't do much about parking. Next on the list would be closed courses, especially closed courses that students need to complete their programs and graduate.

It drives us crazy when our students can't get the classes they need, and the problem is getting worse as budget cuts mean that fewer classes are available.

We can do something about this problem, and in the history department at least, we're trying.

In doing our jobs — scheduling history courses and advising students — we have come across many examples of students abusing the registration system and making life difficult for the majority of students who play by the rules.

For example, all history majors and history education majors are required to take our advanced seminar — History 586. It is always in high demand and fills quickly. What happens when a student registers for every available section of 586? Some other student does not get to take the course, and may not graduate on time.

Many of our history courses are quite popular and fill quickly. Unfortunately, they sometimes fill because students register for more classes than they can possibly take. We have found students who aren't even history majors registered for four, five, or even six history courses in a semester, taking up places that should rightfully go to other students.

Why would anyone register for six history courses in a semester? The two of us love history, and even we wouldn't take six courses.

People do it to see which courses will be easier, to find which instructors they'll like more, to hold places for other students, or simply to avoid making decisions about what to take.

Whatever the reason, it is selfish. It makes life harder for all the students waiting patiently to enroll, only to find that the courses they need and want are all overbooked.

This wouldn't be so bad if K-State had a decent waitlist system for its classes, but as all K-State students need to know, the waitlist system is a joke.

It drives us crazy when students can't get the classes they need, and the problem is getting worse as budget cuts mean fewer classes are available.

When a seat opens up in a full course, that seat doesn't go to the person on the top of the waiting list — it goes to the next person to walk into Enrollment Services. The waiting list means nothing.

The only way the waiting list works is if individual faculty members commit themselves to using it.

Here in the history department, we're doing that. We're cracking down on students who overbook classes. We're also telling our students to use the waiting list, we're telling our faculty to let people into courses based on the waiting list, and we're making sure the only way to get in a full course is through the waiting list.

But more needs to be done. Faculty and departments around campus need to crack down on students double booking popular courses, and they need to make sure that seats in full classes go to the students at the top of the waiting list, not students who happen to talk to the instructor on the first day of class.

Students need to use registration responsibly. It's not a way to save a spot in lots of classes to see what looks easy — that hurts other students, and can even stop them from graduating.

Lastly, the administration needs to fix the registration system. Why does KATS let a student register for two sections of the same course? Why does KATS let a student register for more than 18 hours when that's the maximum the catalog allows? Shouldn't KATS raise a flag when a non-history major registers for six history courses? Shouldn't K-State be telling incoming freshmen that waiting lists are illusions unless professors happen to pay attention to them? Don't K-State students deserve a waitlist system that actually works?

We're doing all we can, but we can't do it alone.

Paper should criticize rival university more

Editor,

So I have a thing against KU. An unreasonable, outrageous loathing for Jayhawk anything. But I can't be the only K-Stater gloating over KU's hopeless athletics situation. That has got to be a bigger story than what was run on April 15.

Page 1: lead story, War in Iraq. Cool. But where is the rest of the NEWS??

"Whacky" Paul Restivo?

Living in an apartment???

No-call lists.

Hmm interesting choice. Not. Drunken driving awareness. That's a good cause.

OK, so you ran a Page One story on no-call lists to justify a "To The Point" editorial calling for jailing phone solicitors.

Really. In the larger scheme of things, isn't the humiliation of KU (a.k.a. Johnson County Community College, West Campus) more important than telemarketers?

Let's hit the vital news points:

1. Roy Williams was too good for KU. And, while he likes to hang on to things

(his putter, for 34 years, his wife for 29 years), KU just didn't cut it for him, so he's moving home. I didn't understand the putter/wife thing, either. Just goes to show you how articulate those affiliated with KU become.

2. Their "dynamic" (read "arrogant jerk") athletic director got the axe in a pathetic attempt to tempt Roy Williams to stay. Didn't work. Ha!

3. KU makes this big deal about being "the birthplace of basketball." John Naim-Smith, evidently, invented the game of basketball to keep young men from masturbating. Oh, yeah, that's Paul Restivo's thing. Never mind.

4. Was Roy really wearing a KU tie to his "I'm-defecting-to-North-Carolina" press conference?

We have a golden opportunity to feed a long-standing intrastate rivalry here. C'mon people. Let's get our priorities straight.

Wildcat tennis team receives 6th seed for Big 12 championships

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After tying a school record by finishing 7-4 in the Big 12, K-State received a sixth seed in this weekend's seventh-annual Big 12 Tennis Championships.

The Cats are set to face 11th-seeded Texas Tech at 2:30 p.m. today at the Plaza Tennis Center in Kansas City, Mo. K-State defeated the Lady Raiders 5-2 on March 1.

While he would have liked to be seeded higher, Coach Steve Bietau isn't questioning his team's position.

"I'd rather be five, but if we were five, I'd rather be four," Bietau said. "I think we're seeded where we deserve to be seeded, and we're playing who we deserve to play."

With a win over the Lady Raiders, the Cats will face third-seeded Texas in a rematch of Sunday's 4-3 win by the Longhorns.

Bietau said he isn't focusing on potential matchups but is taking it one match at a time.

"My feeling is that we played well against Texas, and we did some things better against Texas than we'd been doing before," Bietau said. "I see that as a positive thing. Our team is making a move in the right direction at an important time."

"We're going to try to continue that, and I have no reason to believe that it can't continue. I have every reason to believe that they will make every effort to see that it does continue. Knowing that, I'm not thinking about whether it's

Breaking down the bracket

■ No. 1 Baylor

The Bears, named co-champs along with Texas A&M, received the top seed with a tie-breaking 4-3 dual win over the Aggies on March 25. Led by senior Vida Mulec, the 100th-ranked singles player in the nation, the Bears will face the winner of the Colorado-Kansas match.

■ No. 2 Texas A&M

Arguably the hottest team in the tournament, the Aggies No. 2 doubles combination of Ashley Hedberg and Lauren Walker captured a Big 12 position championship along with Roberta Spencer at No. 3 singles and Nicki Mechem at No. 5 singles. They will face the winner of the Missouri-Nebraska match.

■ No. 3 Texas

The Longhorns closed out their season Sunday with a 4-3 victory over K-State. The Cats were able to sweep the doubles point, including a win over the nation's 19th-ranked doubles team of Ziva Grasic and Kendra Strohm, but Texas rallied back to sweep the top three singles positions. K-State could find itself playing the Longhorns again with a win over Texas Tech.

■ No. 4 Oklahoma State

The 35th-ranked Cowboys enter the tournament on a six-match conference winning streak, something that could make them dangerous. They were the last team to receive a bye, facing the winner of the Oklahoma-Iowa State match.

■ No. 5 Oklahoma

The Sooners feature the top singles player in the Big 12 in junior Anda Perianu, Big 12 position champion at No. 1 singles. Senior Melissa Mendieta joined her as the co-champion at No. 6 singles. They open the tournament against No. 12 Iowa State.

■ No. 6 Kansas State

The Cats tied a school record by finishing with a 7-4 record in the Big 12. Ranked 36th in the nation, K-State opens the tournament against No. 11 Texas Tech, facing a potential rematch against Texas with a victory over the Lady Raiders. The Longhorns defeated K-State 4-3 on Sunday.

■ No. 7 Missouri

The Tigers possess one of the top doubles teams in the Big 12 in junior Urska Juric and sophomore Katka Sevcikova, ranked 11th in the nation. They are set to open with No. 10 Nebraska and will face Texas A&M with a victory over the Huskers.

■ No. 8 Colorado

Colorado enters the tournament on a high note after knocking off Oklahoma 4-3 on Saturday. Led by senior Dominique Lempere, who has posted 65 singles victories during her four-year career, the Buffaloes will face No. 9 Kansas in the first round.

■ No. 9 Kansas

The Jayhawks are the latest team to have suffered Texas A&M's wrath. KU was the victim of a 7-0 loss at the hands of the Aggies on Saturday. Facing No. 8 Colorado, the Jayhawks would have to face top-seeded Baylor with a win over the Buffaloes.

■ No. 10 Nebraska

Led by junior Anna Oehme, who leads the Huskers in both singles and doubles wins, Nebraska will open the tournament against No. 7 Missouri. They also will look to build from the momentum they gained after a 6-1 victory over Iowa State on Saturday.

■ No. 11 Texas Tech

The Lady Raiders feature a nationally ranked player at No. 1 singles in Irina Tereschenko. Ranked 109th, she posted a 14-16 singles record while going 24-7 in doubles play. Texas Tech will face K-State in the first round at 2:30 p.m. today.

■ No. 12 Iowa State

The cellar-dwelling Cyclones will look for their first victory over a Big 12 opponent this season when they face No. 5 Oklahoma. Should the upset happen, Iowa State would face No. 4 Oklahoma State tomorrow.

going to be a problem if we play Texas again."

Also on the line this weekend is a possible berth in the NCAA Tournament. As a bubble team, Bietau said, quality wins this weekend could be a key factor in the minds of the selection committee.

"I really haven't looked at it that closely," Bietau said. "I don't know if our wins are good enough. A quality win or two in the tournament certainly wouldn't hurt us. If we do what we've been talking about, which is play well here and give it our best shot in the tournament, then we're doing everything we can to help ourselves for next week."

He also said that asking his team for extra effort wouldn't be anything new. "The concept of asking them to step up is not something that is new to them

Women's golf gets 6th in Big 12 tournament

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Consistency has been an issue for the women's golf team all season.

In the final round of the Big 12 Championships on Wednesday, the Cats had a consistent round, but it wasn't the consistency they were looking for.

K-State finished in sixth in Columbia, Mo., following a final round 314 in which no K-State player shot better than 5-over par. Coach Kristi Knight said it was just the way things went this week, but she said she was still pleased with the performance.

"It's a mix of good and bad,"

Big 12 results

6 K-State	+72	314
5 Miranda Smith	+10	77
19 Christine Boucher	+18	79
35 Stephanie Limoges	+24	83
38 Karen Quintelier	+25	80
39 Sarah Heffel	+26	78

she said. "It's a tough golf course. I think the girls fought hard today. There weren't that many low scores."

"There were final-round hole locations," Knight said. "We would have liked to finish a little stronger. I think you've got to keep it in perspective. We shot 314 today, and that doesn't sound really good, but if you look at the other teams, we didn't lose any ground."

Football team could play 15 games next season; big change from past schedules

Fifteen games. K-State could potentially have 15 games this fall.

That's right, a 15-game college football season for the Cats.

With K-State receiving a waiver earlier this month to play in the Black Coaches Association exempt game against California, the potential exists. Adding the BCA game at Arrowhead in Kansas City, Mo., would give the Cats 13 games.

Then add in the Big 12 Championship game at Arrowhead and the Sugar Bowl, which gives the Cats the possibility of playing — and winning — 15 games.

Some might say this scenario is a long shot, but with 12 starters returning from last year's 11-2 squad that won the Holiday Bowl, it is a definite possibility.

The possibility of 15 games is quite a change from only a few years ago.

Before the mid-1990s, almost all Division I schools only had the possibility of playing 11 football games a year. The lone exception to the rule was that any school that played Hawaii was allowed to play 12 games. Even with this rule on the books, most schools didn't even think about adding a 12th game. Many coaches were leery of stretching their seasons too long. And besides, most thought, the longer the season, the more chances to lose.

The advent of the "Super Conferences" such as the SEC, Big 12, and MAC during the mid-1990s changed everything. In 1996, the Western Athletic Conference expanded, and the Big Eight accepted four Texas schools to create the Big 12. When both of these conferences had at least 12 teams, they were allowed to divide up into two divisions and have a conference championship game.

Only one school has played a 15-game schedule in the history of NCAA football. That was BYU, which went 14-1 in 1996, the same year it beat K-State 19-15 in the Cotton Bowl.

Some people have said playing so many games could be negative. The usual response

Tennis | Students invited to tournament
Entries for the Manhattan Open Adult Tennis Tournament, 8:30 a.m. on May 3 at City Park, are being taken until April 29.

The tournament includes men's and women's singles and doubles play as well as mixed doubles. K-State students are encouraged to participate, but players must be 18 or older.

Players can enter one of three competition levels, and entry fees are $12 per singles event and $16 for a doubles team.

Prizes will be awarded to first and second place winners. For more information or for entry forms, call Cottonwood Racquet Club at 776-6060.

Baseball | Game canceled due to rain
K-State's game with Southeast Missouri State, set for Wednesday afternoon, was canceled due to inclement weather in the Manhattan area.

The game will not be rescheduled. K-State (12-26, 2-13) returns to action on Friday, as the Wildcats begin a three-game series with Texas (32-13, 13-5) at Ditch-Falk Field in Austin, Texas, beginning at 6:30 p.m.

WNBA | Details of agreement hashed out
Five days after reaching what the players' association termed an agreement in principle on a new collective bargaining agreement, lawyers for the WNBA and the union were still working on final details Wednesday.

The two sides met Tuesday into the night and resumed meetings Wednesday afternoon.

Olympics | Bribery case reinstated
Citing the international importance of the Olympics, a federal appeals court reinstated the case against two men accused of doling out bribes of cash, gifts and favors to win the Winter Games for Salt Lake City.

In overturning a Salt Lake federal judge's 2001 dismissal of the charges, the 10th Circuit Court of Appeals set the stage for Tom Welch, 58, who was president of the bid and organizing committees, and Dave Johnson, 44, who was senior vice president, to stand trial.

In its ruling Tuesday, the appeals court said U.S. District Judge David Sam had "narrowly perceived the indictment as the government's attempt to assert jurisdiction over a matter of purely state and local concern."

NFL | Packers sign Crouch

The Green Bay Packers claimed Eric Crouch off waivers from the St. Louis Rams and said Wednesday they planned to give him a shot at quarterback.

Crouch won the 2001 Heisman Trophy as a quarterback at Nebraska, but he sat out of football last season after the Rams drafted him in the third round and tried to convert him into a wide receiver.

Crouch forfeited his signing bonus after training camp last year, saying he'd rather retire if he couldn't be an NFL quarterback.

He remains on the reserve/retired list.

NBA | Wallace Defensive Player of the Year
Ben Wallace of the Detroit Pistons won the NBA's Defensive Player of the Year award for the second straight season Wednesday.

Wallace became the sixth player to win the award in consecutive seasons, receiving 100 out of a possible 117 first-place votes from a panel of sports writers and broadcasters. Ron Artest of Indiana, Kevin Garnett of Minnesota, Tim Duncan of San Antonio and Doug Christie of Sacramento rounded out the top five.

The 6-foot-9, 240-pound Wallace averaged a league-best 15.4 rebounds, the highest regular-season average since Dennis Rodman's 16.1 in 1996-97. Wallace averaged 3.15 blocked shots, second to Atlanta's Theo Ratliff, who averaged 3.23 blocks.

College basketball | Crean staying put

Tom Crean has agreed to a new contract to remain coach at Marquette, ending speculation he was the leading contender for the Illinois job.

Crean, who led Marquette to its first Final Four appearance in 26 years, said Tuesday night he'd agreed to a new deal. Terms were not disclosed, although athletic director Bill Cords said Wednesday the contract contains no escape clauses as had been speculated.

Professor says partner violence could be decreased

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Researching men who commit intimate-partner violence could reveal ways to decrease future violence, a speaker said Wednesday.

Julia Wood, professor at the University of Northern Carolina and author of the book "Gendered Lives," spoke Wednesday night at the K-State Alumni Center to a crowd of about 400 people. The speech was a part of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications lecture series.

In her speech, Wood discussed her findings from a study she conducted by interviewing 22 male prisoners at a medium security prison.

The men Wood spoke with admitted to having committed intimate-partner violence, but most were in prison for other violent crimes.

Wood said she thought the viewpoints of the men who committed violent acts against women should be researched in hopes of decreasing violence in the United States.

"Understanding is the best starting point for rehabilitation," she said.

During the speech, Wood said her research revealed two consistencies for the men she interviewed.

"First, all of the men saw violence against women as justified when they felt that they had been disrespected as men," Wood said.

Wood went on to say that each of these men thought he was in charge of his household.

Wood said that when a woman would disrespect them by doing things such as not having dinner ready or not being home at a certain time, the men thought that the violent acts they had committed were justified.

"They felt they have a natural-born right to punish a woman who has disrespected them," she said.

Also, Wood found that the men's views of violence were linked to their perceptions and ideas of manhood and masculinity in general.

Two different ideals were present in most of the men, Wood said. Most of the men believed in a patriarchal household, in which the man is the head of the house. However, they also believe in a chivalrous code that dictates that men should protect and respect women, she said.

Wood said these two different views are often contradictory, and they have been learned in a society that accepts both views.

Wood quoted one of the men she interviewed as having said, "I fell into the pants. She fell into the dress. I started dishing it out. She started taking it. It was natural."

Wood said many of the men thought they had failed as men in providing for their families.

"The only place they felt they had power was in that relationship," she said.

Wood said that studying what these men were thinking could increase prevention and rehabilitation to decrease intimate-partner violence in the United States.

"The current codes of masculinity are not the only ones that can exist," she said. "There is a mix of possibilities."

Wood said that by changing people's lives at a basic level and changing the perception of what the male role "should be," intimate-partner violence can be fought and decreased.

"We need to invest in things that create different possibilities in people's lives," she said. "Morally ... pragmatically and rationally, we need to be preventative and not just clean up the messes that are made."

County to limit current hiring freeze

New 90-day limit to give department heads flexibility

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Riley County commissioners will review positions today that could indicate an end to the indefinite hiring freeze that was put into effect in January.

Commissioners agreed to put a 90-day limit on the hiring freeze to give department heads more flexibility in filling positions, Janet Dean, human resource coordinator, said.

Some positions have been filled, including executive level positions that the commission deemed necessary for the county government to function, Dean said.

The hiring freeze was implemented to help conserve funds after the county was forced to cut nearly $1 million when the state refused to disperse its demand transfer funds. Dean said the Commission had decided the county already was operating on a lean budget, so money could be saved by leaving positions vacant.

Johnette Mueller, county budget and finance operator, said the amount of money saved by leaving positions vacant has not been figured, nor is it likely an amount will be figured in the future.

Dean said the Commission realized that some departments were suffering because of shortened staff, which is why they are implementing the 90-day limit.

The limit will apply whenever a county employee quits, retires or is fired. Initial phases of the hiring process can be started within the first 90 days after a position becomes vacant, but a new employee will not be hired until after 90 days and the Commission approves the position, Dean said.

Iraqi weapon site search yields no findings

By Pauline Jelinek
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — American forces are changing their search strategy after coming up empty at most of the top suspected weapons sites in Iraq, officials said Wednesday.

And the White House appeared to be trying to scale back expectations that weapons of mass destruction will be found.

Troops on the ground have searched more than 80 sites that prewar U.S. intelligence judged the most likely hiding places for chemical and biological weapons as well as evidence of an Iraqi nuclear program, Defense Department officials said on condition of anonymity.

There are more than 1,000 suspected sites but 100 or so were the searchers' top priority.

Some analysis is pending on some substances found. But finding no stockpiles of chemical or biological agents after more than a month into the campaign, teams are now setting aside the search list and deciding where to go more on the basis of new information from Iraqis, three defense officials said Wednesday.

"We did have several hundred sites that we had some history of intelligence on that we were going to exploit," said Lt. Gen. David McKiernan, commander of land forces in Iraq. "This regime over the last decade has been pretty good at hiding material and moving it around, so it was no surprise to any of us that many of these sites that we've already exploited have not necessarily turned up the material."

Two other officials said that in recent days officials have realized the list is of questionable value because of the ability of the Iraqis to destroy or remove weapons and equipment.

Although U.S. officials say the war is not over, more forces are headed home. The aircraft carrier USS Harry S. Truman and its battle group of 11 ships has been released from wartime duty and is scheduled to arrive at its home port of Norfolk, Va., in May, officials said Wednesday. The Truman left Norfolk Dec. 5 and originally was to complete its sea duty in early June.

The Truman is now in the Mediterranean Sea, along with the USS Theodore Roosevelt carrier battle group. Two other carriers, the USS Kitty Hawk and the USS Constellation, left the Persian Gulf last week. The only carrier now in the Gulf is the USS Nimitz.

Also, two of the three Marine Expeditionary Units that fought in Iraq are preparing to head home. The 24th Marine Expeditionary Unit will soon be headed back to Camp Lejeune, N.C., and the 15th Marine Expeditionary Unit will follow a short time later en route home to Camp Pendleton, Calif., officials said. Both units have about 2,000 people.

The sites in Iraq searched for chemical and biological weapons have included mosques, homes, factories and government ministries. Teams arrived to find buildings completely empty — swept of any evidence, one official said.

Parking Public Forum Manhattan

A public forum to discuss the 2003-2004 proposed parking regulation changes will be held April 24th from 3:30 to 4:30 unless completed sooner. The meeting will be held in the Big 12 room, K-State Student Union.

Changes Include:

- A wording change to make clear when parking is only allowed in lots specified by displayed permit.
- A wording change to make clear the refund policy.
- A change that does not allow retirees to have reserved stalls.
- A paragraph that allows the suspension of parking privileges for stealing permits, illegal disabled placards, etc., with appeals sent to the SGA Student Tribunal.

K-State's Andrea Cooper makes a return in a singles match against Texas A&M on Friday. The Cats face Texas Tech today in the first round of the Big 12 Tennis Tournament. Lindsey Bauman COLLEGIAN up is not something that is new to them because we've been asking them to do that the whole time," Bietau said. "If they hadn't stepped it up on a regular basis, they wouldn't be in the position they are now."

Bietau said the main concern coming into the spring was the play of the lower half of his singles lineup.

"Early in the season we didn't do anything in the bottom half of the lineup, and that was a big concern," Bietau said. "Hayley (McIver) has moved up and played much better. Andrea (Cooper) has ended up having a pretty solid season down there. Paulina (Castillejos) has had her struggles, but she's helping us a lot in the doubles playing one, and she played a pretty good match against Texas on Sunday."

Regardless of the weekend's outcome, Bietau said he enjoyed working with the team.

"Academically, these are all great students," Bietau said. "It's a pretty smart group and they've got their priorities straight as far as school, so they've already got a pretty good work ethic built in."

The track team already has battled in the Texas and Kansas relays.

This weekend, though, they will venture to Des Moines, Iowa, for the most prestigious regular season meet of the season: the Drake Relays.

"Historically, those three — Texas, Kansas and Drake — along with the Penn Relays, are the oldest in the country," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "Drake and Penn are on the same weekend, so the country is split, but this weekend is really the granddaddy of them all."

Twenty of K-State's best tracksters will represent the Cats at Drake.

Amy Mortimer will run the 1,500-meter, and Joseph Lee and Erik Sproll will compete in the 800-meter run.

Dustin Schmidt will pole vault. Kyle Lancaster, Chaytan Hill and Queeneth Evurunobi will jump. Jerry McCloud will run the hurdles and Trish Culbertson will run the 5,000 meter.

Three Wildcat relay teams also will compete this weekend.

Mortimer enters the meet as the Cats' top performer.

Last weekend, she set the school record in the 5,000 meter and should have a shot at capturing the individual title in the 1,500.

Rovelto was inducted into the meet's Hall of Fame last year.

"K-State has done pretty well there," Rovelto said. "We're pretty high on the title list. I don't know how I got into the hall of fame. Most of the coaches there have been there a lot longer than I have. I am by far the youngest guy in there."

Drake also will represent one of the last chances for athletes to improve their performance before the conference meet in three weeks.

Rovelto said there should be a lot of good performances in the next two weeks as athletes hit their stride after training hard all season. Workouts will be geared down for the remainder of the regular season to make sure everyone is in top condition for the conference meet May 17-19 in Austin, Texas.

"Basically, if you're not ready, you're not going to get ready at this point," Rovelto said. "This weekend, we'll see how people do, and it will give us an idea how they will perform at the conference meet."

SHANK | Increased amount of games will excite K-State football fans

is that playing more games leaves players more apt to injury.

However, the positives outweigh the negatives.

K-State will have an advantage over opponents since more of their players will have game experience. More games mean more minutes of real-game experience for everyone on the Cats' roster.

Having more games also will mean more media exposure for K-State. The Cats will have multiple chances throughout the season for nationally televised games, specifically the BCA game, conference matchups, possible

Big 12 championship game, and bowl game.

Television exposure never hurts a program, unless you get walloped like Nebraska did by the Cats last year in Manhattan.

K-State will have the possibility of being the first NCAA Division I school to win 15 games in a season.

With hopes high in Manhattan, who wouldn't want to get a few more chances to watch the 2003 football team?

FIGHTING WORDS

Politically charged music controversial, allows artists to express views on war

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

War — what is it good for?

How about some politically motivated music?

The complexity and emotional tension war causes can play an important role in art, Gary Mortenson, professor of art, said.

"Music and art always reflect what is going on in the world," he said. "War is extremely complicated, and art is going to mirror that."

Mortenson said popular artists have made clear their stances on the war with Iraq. However, taking a one-sided, clear-cut position on a complex issue can ruin the longevity of a song.

"The only thing I can say about war is that it confuses the hell out of me," Mortenson said. "Any truly great artist can find a way to capture the complexity of war and relate that to his audience."

Natalie Maines of the Dixie Chicks said during an overseas concert that she was ashamed President Bush was from her home state of Texas. Madonna recently released an anti-war video in England but did not release it in the United States.

Toby Keith's "Courtesy of the Red, White and Blue" sings about the anger after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks, saying to the responsible parties, "We'll put a boot in your ass, it's the American way."

Emotions such as anger or resentment are passing once logical heads prevail, Mortenson said, which is why these types of songs will fade with the anger.

"Pop music is manufactured for an immediate time, an immediate audience and immediate consumption," he said. "Any song that deals with the base emotions will not stand the test of time."

John Anderson, program director and announcer for KBLS-FM 102.5, said requests for his soldier dedications show have included more than just songs that are currently popular.

Some of the most popular requests, he said, are Lee Greenwood's "God Bless the U.S.A." and Bette Midler's "Wind Beneath My Wings."

Other songs that have sentimental personal meanings are also popular, he said.

"It's overwhelming," he said. "An unbelievable number of folks are just really grateful for the show."

Anderson said he has received numerous calls and e-mails during the past nine weeks, since the troop dedications show began. Most people were grateful for the support the show gave to the troops and their families, he said.

Mortenson said that few songs will maintain popularity in future generations. Only those that capture the complexity of life — and war — will endure the test of time.

He cited Beethoven, who dedicated his third symphony to Napoleon Bonaparte. However, once Napoleon waged war and named himself emperor, Beethoven lost respect for him.

As a political statement, Beethoven crossed out the original dedication and instead dedicated the song to "the memory of a great man." Although Napoleon was still alive, Mortenson said, Beethoven was making a bold statement about how war and power can change a person.

"Beethoven's an artist that people will still remember in a thousand years," he said. "You have to make them see something they didn't see at first."

Despite the complexity that can be expressed through music, Mortenson said the meshing of visual elements is becoming a necessary part of art.

"All the major tributes and reflections after 9/11 were collages," he said. "The images were so powerful, you didn't need any lyrics."

The combination of pictures flashing and somber music playing for the audiences made some of the post-Sept. 11 works memorable, Mortenson said.

"The way the media portrays things elicits very specific thoughts," he said. "War is a series of gut checks. Only art that captures the complexity will endure."

Theater department to present Pulitzer Prize-winning play

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A litany of costume changes including everything from Moses to showgirls and the use of multimedia make the theater department's production of "Skin of Our Teeth" a wild time, Director Charlotte MacFarland said.

The show includes a music video and a newscast, a portion of which will be conducted in the audience and projected on to a screen in the theater.

"On a lot of shows, I've put actors in the audience as a directorial choice, but the script for this one calls for it," MacFarland said. "Wilder does a lot of things. He was experimenting with what it means to have a theater production."

"Skin of Our Teeth," Thornton Wilder's 1942 Pulitzer Prize-winning play, is about the destruction of the world and surviving, MacFarland said.

"When he wrote it he wasn't sure of course what was going to happen in World War II. He had been to London and saw the devastation in Europe and was horrified by what was going on in the war," she said.

The play opens in a setting that is simultaneously modern. Englewood, N.J., and the Ice Age, and the audience is introduced to the Antrobus family.

Mr. Antrobus and his wife symbolize the human species as man and woman. They have two children, Gladys — the archetypal daughter — and Henry, the Antrobus' son. MacFarland said that Henry is a violent child, and his real name is Cain, an allusion to the Bible.

In the course of Act I, lots of figures from history — Queen Elizabeth, Moses and the muses from Greek mythology — come into the house and try to keep warm as the Ice Age threatens extinction. The characters ask, "Will we survive?" as an iceberg slices the living room.

Everyone involved in the production is impressed with the costume work, George Stavropoulos, sopho-

Jamie Stires, "Sabina" seduces George Stavropoulos, "Mr. Antrobus" during the play "The Skin of our Teeth." The play is written by Thornton Wilder and will be presented at Nichols Theatre April 24-26, April 30 and May 1-3. All shows starts at 8 p.m.

more in theater, said.

We have such an amazing staff here. In terms of college theater, it's the best around on a regional level," Stavropoulos, who plays Mr. Antrobus, said. "This show has only raised the bar because there is so many of these costumes, and the stage is so much bigger."

The tension of "Skin of Our Teeth," has heightened meaning now after America's involvement overseas, Stavropoulos said.

"The story is about the survival of the human race. That's important when you're looking at war and the foreign affairs," Stavropoulos said. "You start thinking, 'have we learned from our mistakes?'"

Thornton Wilder, the playwright, talks about how we have learned from our mistakes. It's sort of sad to see that we haven't come too far. It makes you think about your purpose, your role in society. What are you doing to better this world?" he said.

Judge denies Sony Pictures' request to keep lawsuit sealed

A Superior Court judge rejected a request by Sony Pictures Entertainment to seal documents in a lawsuit that Marvel comics filed over Spider-Man.

Judge Alexander H. Williams III on Monday also rejected a Sony request to refer the case to private arbitration rather than a jury trial.

Williams said there was no evidence an open proceeding in the breach of contract and license merchandising lawsuit would hurt either side.

THE FOUR BIGGEST DIETING MISTAKES

By Rick Tague, M.D., M.P.H.
Board Certified in Medical Weight Management

If you made a New Year's resolution to lose weight but have struggled...or have already failed...you are not alone.

Numerous studies show that over 96% of all self-imposed diets fail to bring about a significant long-term weight loss. Regardless of how much willpower you have, the odds are against you when dieting on your own. And with less than a 4% chance of long-term success, you may ask, "why even try?"

Fortunately, a medical specialty called bariatric medicine has discovered simple, easy-to-follow solutions to the four biggest dieting mistakes. The biggest dieting mistakes are:

1. Using a "cookie cutter" approach to choosing your diet. I call this the "one size fits all" diet. No one gains weight...or loses weight...the same way. In order to be successful your program must be individualized around your personal needs, your likes and dislikes, your medical needs, your family history, your environment, your level of stress and more. Unfortunately, fad diets call for everyone to follow the same diet forever which accounts for such a dismal success rate.

2. No medical monitoring of your weight loss. This may lead to losing muscle and even bone versus losing body fat. Losing muscle causes your metabolism to slow down and contributes greatly to eventual weight regain and makes losing weight "the next time" even more difficult. Weight loss must be medically monitored to insure that what you are eating - how often and at what times during the day - causes you to melt away fat...not muscle.

3. Attempting to fight the "cravings battle" alone. Let's face it, cravings can be an almost impossible "enemy" to fight. The reason is that cravings are hardwired into your body's natural self-protection system.

Brain chemicals causing cravings is one of the ways your body preserves itself from starvation. Of course changing your eating habits by dieting doesn't mean you are starving, but your body doesn't know that. Fortunately, using an individualized high nutrient program, adjusting meal frequency, and other medical techniques including appetite suppressants (when appropriate and only if needed), can eliminate cravings which then makes losing unwanted fat pounds easy.

4. Not recognizing there may be underlying medical reasons causing your weight gain. Obviously fad diets do not address your individual medical history nor do they evaluate and monitor blood and lab findings that can provide quick answers to your past difficulty with losing weight. A physician specializing in medical weight management is able to identify and correct hormonal imbalances and other medical problems that can be the key to a slimmer you.

Losing weight doesn't have to be an uphill battle, and more than likely past failures haven't been your fault. An individual's genetics, metabolism, medical problems, life stresses and food cravings can make weight loss on your own a very difficult undertaking. Make sure any program you undertake avoids these four common mistakes.

Also, seek a medical doctor who specializes in nutrition and medical weight management. Not all physicians have this specialized training. And if you'd like more information about how you can finally achieve weight loss success, please call my office today at 776-4443 to set up a complimentary office visit.

the world, we feel it right here in Kansas," she wrote. "Today's rally in Manhattan is a good example of support."

Ryun focused his speech on the effort of the military to rebuild Iraq. He said the electricity is back on, and the oil is flowing again.

"The vast majority of Iraqis are very appreciative," he said. "They are experiencing something they have never had before."

Ryun said that while the war has been swift and few lives have been lost, people should honor the sacrifice.

"As we look to celebration, let us remember the sweat, blood and tears and say thank you very much for the sacrifice," he said.

Those attending the rally not only listened to speeches by Kline and Ryun, as well as several others, but local performers as well.

The Little Apple Barbershop Chorus sang several songs including a rendition of "God Bless America," which everyone in the audience stood to honor.

"They have heard of the protesters, and it will be nice to know that while they are fighting - possibly dying - the people are supporting them," she said.

The decrease in numbers is concentrated in the Intensive English class, Wood said.

"The commitment to this program is not as strong," Wood said. "Students can postpone their study as they wait for things to calm down throughout the world."

Wood said the war with Iraq and new immigration policies, which make the process of obtaining a visa more difficult, are possible causes of the decline of applications.

"There is a lot of uncertainty in a number of different things," she said, "but we do feel like things will work themselves out, and the interest will peak again."

Because the English Language Program is self-supporting, Wood said, the department is finding ways to deal with the shortfall of applications, which translates into a lack of funding for the program.

"Obviously, if we don't have enough students, it is financially not good for us," she said. "So for now, we are sharing duties with other offices to fill the void. We have a talented staff that has picked up additional responsibilities."

Wood said the office has received several inquiries and a couple of early applications for the fall semester, which she sees as positive.

"We will just have to wait and see, but I do think we are going to be OK," she said.

"Our feeling is now that the new immigration policies are in place and the war with Iraq is calming down, we will start to see an upturn again in applications because things are calming down in the world."

was senior Miranda Smith who finished in a tie for fifth place. Although she struggled in the final round Wednesday, she finished at 10-over and helped herself with a one-under round in Tuesday's second round.

"I'm really happy for Miranda," Knight said. "She kind of had a little bit of a train wreck in the middle of her round and had a couple bad holes. But she came back and birdied two of her last three to finish tied for fifth."

"You're talking about a player that had never played well in this event before," she said. "Coming in as a senior, I'm just really happy and proud for her."

Oklahoma State shot a final round 304 to finish 27 strokes ahead of the Wildcats. Sara Sasse of Nebraska shot even par on Wednesday to win the individual title by three strokes.

"Sixth place - we'll take that," Knight said. "Our goal is that we would have liked to improve on last year. We did improve on our total score. I'm proud of them, and hopefully that will get us into regionals, and we'll go from there."

The NCAA Regionals are May 8-10 in Lincoln, Neb. Knight and her team will find out Monday if they get to make the trip.

"They have a selection committee," Knight said. "They look at your head-to-heads and your competition throughout the year. It's based on your performance throughout the year."

"I feel good about it," she said. "I have a good feeling about it, but we'll wait and see."

Women to participate in march

5th-annual Take Back the Night March to help women feel safe

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Women will have an opportunity to walk in public and feel safe tonight.

Ordinary Women's fifth-annual Take Back the Night March begins at 8 p.m. at the Union Plaza.

The march begins with a speech by Elizabeth Crane, who works at a Kansas women's clinic, Michelle Janette, Ordinary Women's adviser, said.

Taking the night

What: Annual march to symbolizes women's ability to feel safe.

Where: Union Plaza

When: 8 tonight

The women will then march through Aggieville and end in City Park where there will be a concert.

"We sponsor the march because women are especially vulnerable to violence because they are women," Janette said. "And we would like to see that changed."

Janette said the event is symbolic of women's ability to be safe in the home, in the workplace and especially in public.

"This is one moment when women will be able to be out in the streets in public without escorts and feel safe," she said.

Janette said Ordinary Women, a campus feminist organization, meets regularly and participates in different activities at each meeting.

"Aside from the march, we have also sponsored a peace rally, a film festival and several art nights where we just get together and paint," she said.

As far as tonight's march, Janette said she is mostly concerned about the weather.

"I hope it doesn't rain," she said. "And I hope everybody comes out to support us."

The march has been successful in the past, and Janette said she expects 300 to 400 people to attend tonight based on past attendance.

Student Senate, administration seek agreement for 5-year tuition plan

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The weeks of work student senators put toward seeing student-centered enhancements through proposed expenditures have paid off.

Student Senate

The following items were discussed at Thursday night's Student Senate meeting:

■ Jason Heaser was sworn in as the student affairs and social services chair for the 2003-04 term.

■ University administration addressed senators with an update of the five-year tuition plan as well as providing a brief description of the proposed expenditures for fiscal year 2004.

University administration made an appearance at Thursday's Student Senate meeting to update senators on the progress of the five-year tuition plan, as well as commending senators for their hard work with the proposed expenditures for fiscal year 2004.

"We have all come together, and people are supportive of how the expenditures would be deployed this coming year," said Bob Krause, vice president of institutional advancement. "You folks did a heck of a job."

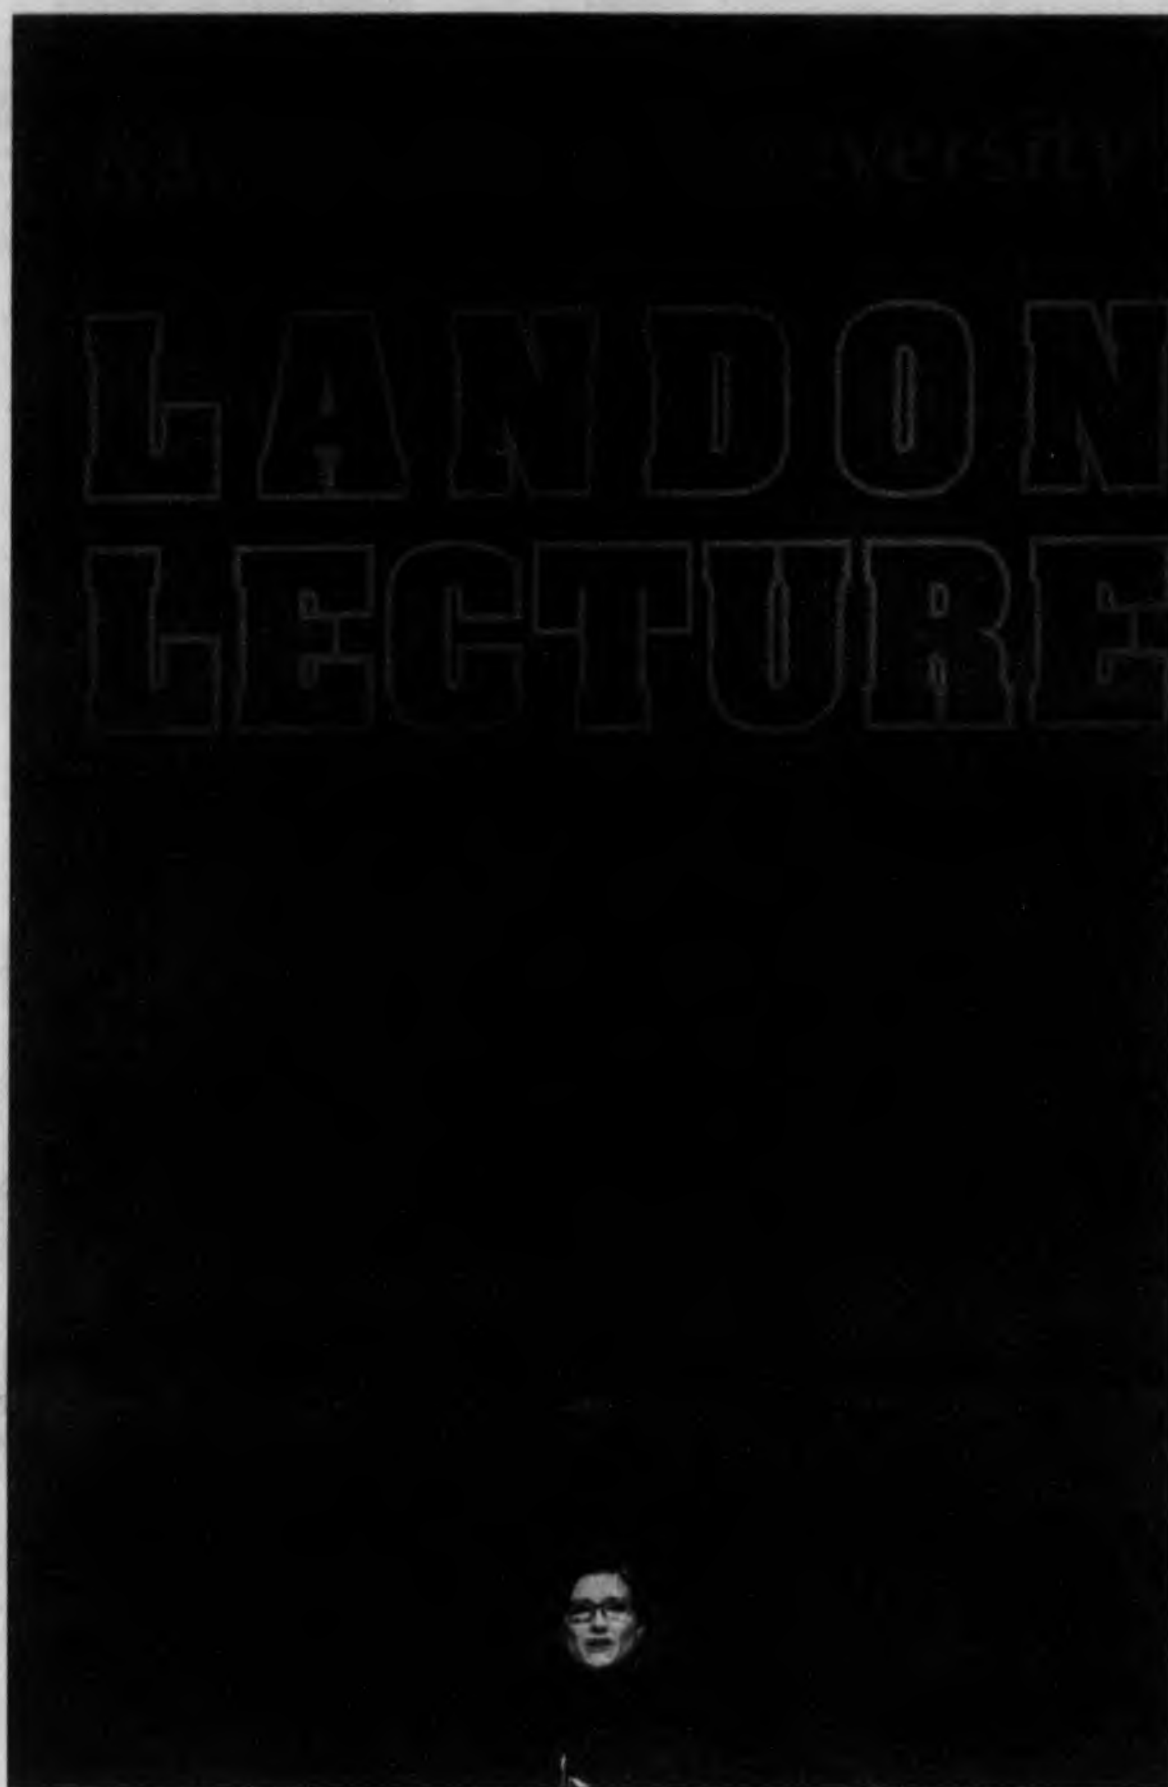

Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, said the administration has been working since December 2002 on expenditures. The past six weeks of work, however, have involved student senators from the academic affairs and executive committees. These senators offered suggestions and proposals for prioritizing the student enhancements.

According to the fiscal year 2004 expenditure guide, 3 percent of this year's base budget from additional tuition revenue will be set aside for the base budget inflationary increase, which addresses the cost of living increases.

Rawson said 24 percent will also be set aside for need-based tuition reductions to undergraduate students who demonstrate financial need through financial aid.

Banfield delivers 129th Landon Lecture

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The scenes the American public saw on cable television during the war with Iraq might not be the truth, a journalist said Thursday.

"I am very concerned about this three-week TV show and how it might have changed people's opinions," Ashleigh Banfield, reporter for MSNBC, said. "The TV show we gave you was exciting. It was entertaining. I hope that the legacy it leaves behind doesn't give only that impression. War is ugly and dangerous, and we didn't see that."

Banfield, host of "MSNBC Investigates" and an NBC News correspondent, delivered the 129th Landon Lecture about the effects of embedded journalists in the war with Iraq.

"There were a lot of journalists who were skeptical of the embedded process in Iraq," Banfield said. "It certainly did show the American side of things because that is where we were shooting the coverage."

She said it also gave journalists, including Arab journalists, the opportunity to see, without any type of censorship, what was happening.

"They saw how these fights were being fought, how these soldiers were behaving, what civil affairs soldiers were doing, and what humanitarian aid really looked like," Banfield said. "For that element alone, it was a wonderful new arm of access journalists got to the war. But that said, what didn't we see?"

Banfield said viewers didn't see where the bullets landed.

"What happens when a mortar lands?" she said. "A mortar is not a puff of smoke. That is not what a mortar looks like. There were horrors completely left out of this war. Is this journalism, or is this coverage?"

MSNBC reporter Ashleigh Banfield said there is a difference between journalism and coverage, and that embedded reporters were a prime example of the difference.

North Korea acts tough during 2nd day of talks

By Christopher Bodeen
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — North Korea accused the United States of leading the region toward war Thursday in an apparent attempt by the communist nation to increase pressure on negotiators holding a second day of talks on its nuclear programs.

There was no indication whether any progress had come from the second day of meetings Thursday.

The chief U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State James Kelly, declined to answer questions upon returning to his hotel in the afternoon, saying only that the sides "had talks."

Discussions were scheduled to end Friday. Kelly was to fly to Seoul the same day to meet with South Korean officials.

North Korea continued to try to ratchet up the pressure and is believed to want economic aid in exchange for concessions.

Its leaders are outraged over U.S. moves to cut off oil shipments because of its suspected nuclear weapons program, and fears it is next on Washington's list for military action.

Fast food, super-size deals cause change in Americans' notions of food portions

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Tammy Schaffler came to K-State from South Africa, one of the first things she noticed was the large food portions in America.

"They must be three-times larger than any place in the world," said Schaffler, graduate student in drama therapy.

A recent survey by the Journal of the American Medical Association said food portions have grown larger in the last 25 years.

Sandy Procter, registered dietitian with K-State research and extension, said that when soda first appeared in American grocery stores, six ounces was a regular size. She said a 20-ounce bottle now is the most common size.

The portion size has changed in our minds, she said, but the calories needed in a serving hasn't.

"Our perception of what we should have is so skewed," she said.

"We really don't know what a regular serving size is anymore."

She said the large portions have a lot to do with cost, and food is being substituted for better service.

"Most people want a positive value when they eat out. If it isn't going to be with the service, we better be wowed by the amount of food we are getting," Procter said.

Katrina Kirchner, sophomore in dietetics, said that when it comes to fast food, people want value.

She said people are eating more of the types of foods that are high in fat and empty calories, all for the convenience and value.

"They want to super size things because it feels like they get more for the money," she said.

A survey done by the Journal of the American Medical Association noted that common food and drink portions have grown considerably larger in the last 25 years.

COLLEGIAN

Schaffler said a regular size order of french fries here is equivalent to a "super size" order of fries in South Africa.

She said the idea of value is what drives people to eat larger portions.

"The value, for the money, is excellent," Schaffler said. "But the size is incredible."

Large portions also can distort our views on hunger, Procter said.

"If you are presented with a large portion, it gives us the message of what should be consumed in one meal," Procter said, "and to get your money's worth, you should be able to eat it all."

However, Kirchner said there are ways to use the large portions to your advantage.

"Restaurants give you about three times the amount you need," she said. "So get a take out box and eat it for lunch tomorrow."

Study shows Americans eat larger portions

By Angela L. Gorter
THE BOWLING GREEN STATE NEWS

BOWLING GREEN, Ohio — The majority of individuals and families have increased all across America the amount of food on their plates. According to a recent survey by the Journal of the American Medical Association, within the past 25 years, food portions have become significantly larger and contain more fat and calories.

The increase of food portions, not to be confused with serving sizes, has led many researchers to question the cause.

Many put blame upon the fast-food industries, claiming the "super-sizing" phenomenon has led Americans to form the habit of eating more at each sitting. However, the main concern with this issue is how much the increase affects weight gain in society.

Rebecca Pobocik, associate professor of nutrition, said that although availability and affordability have drawn the consumer toward the fast-food industries, which offer the bigger sizes, there is a shared responsibility between the two.

Even at sit-down restaurants, she said, food portions are larger. This is the case specifically in those restaurants that serve "family-style" helpings.

In addition, the sizes of an average muffin and cookie have increased. One muffin today may give consumers twice as many servings as one would have 10 years ago.

As a result, people lose perspective on what is a serving, Pobocik said.

A serving, according to a publication of the USDA

Center for Nutrition Policy and Promotion, "is a unit of measure used to describe the total amount of food recommended daily from each of the food groups."

The difference between the serving and the portion is that the portion is the specific amount of food, greater or less than the Food Guide Pyramid's suggestion.

Between 1977 and 1998, JAMA surveys found that the average soft drink size increased from 14 ounces to a much larger 20 ounces. This hike in portion sizes has led to higher fat and calorie content.

These increases can lead to an extra 100 calories per day, which can equal up to an extra 10 pounds per year, said the JAMA researchers.

Within a decade, local and national statistics taken from the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention have shown that one out of five Americans is obese. The JAMA research also concluded that the same hamburger that was served in campus dining halls, containing only 390 calories, now packs on up to 608 calories.

"We need to be aware of what we are eating," Pobocik said. She advocates familiarity with the Food Guide Pyramid and its daily allowances. Franketti said it is only a matter of self-control and a change in an individual's eating habits.

Nevertheless, what the increase in food portions comes down to is the idea of getting more food for your dollar.

"[Sometimes] quality is not an issue," Franketti said.

In almost all cases, the eyes are bigger than the stomach. However, with this present trend, the stomachs may soon be bigger than the wallets.

Event to benefit cancer patients

Relay for Life to raise money for research

By Kelli Pitman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Memorial Stadium will be alive from 6 tonight until 6 a.m. Saturday, as students take part in the all-night event, Relay for Life.

Relay for Life is an American Cancer Society event that raises money to fund the services and resources that the society provides to cancer patients and their families, and also raises money for cancer research, said Michele Moorman, senior in life sciences and co-chair of Relay for Life.

About 45 teams of eight to 15 people began raising money about two to three months ago. Each individual was asked to raise $100 either by selling luminaries or by asking for donations. The fund-raising goal was set at $40,000.

"One hundred dollars may seem like a lot, especially for a college student, but selling 10 luminaries reaches that individual goal," Moorman said. "The money is given to the ACS, who distributes it to their programs and the research organizations they work with."

Moorman said that on the night of the relay, all the teams come together to have a big party. Each team chooses a theme and decorates its own campsite around Memorial Stadium. Throughout the night, each team keeps at least one person walking on the track at all times.

"The symbolism is that cancer never stops or sleeps, so for one night, we won't either," she said.

There also will be many activities to keep participants entertained. These include live entertainment, games, free food and prizes. Additionally, cancer survivors associated with the university have been invited to attend.

Carrie Darrow, cancer survivor chair, said letters were sent out to recruit survivors to attend the event.

"We were looking for cancer survivors who were related to campus, which is difficult to do in a university setting," said Darrow, senior in Spanish and international studies.

There also will be a survivor dinner provided by Porter's West on Friday before the event. It is free to any survivor.

Opening ceremonies will begin at 6 p.m. with a welcome, and then the cancer survivors will take a victory lap. After their lap, all teams take a lap together. From then on, the teams will be walking.

At 10 p.m., there will be a luminary ceremony in which the names written on the luminaries are read with a time for reflection and remembrance. The luminaries honor those people who either have died from cancer or honor those that are survivors.

"It is quite powerful because of the many feelings and emotions the participants experience," Moorman said.

Amy Martin, junior in psychology, will be participating in the event and said her favorite part of the relay is walking around the track and looking at the luminaries.

"They are a visual reminder of people who are fighting cancer," Martin said. "You remember why you are staying up all night."

Student winning battle with cancer, encourages all to become more involved with fund-raising efforts

Being diagnosed with cancer was a shock. The diagnosis initially was devastating.

But Benjamin Bussard, junior in golf course management, said he learned quickly the diagnosis wasn't a death sentence.

It was, however, emotionally and physically trying, Bussard said.

"I didn't see cancer as something that teenagers got," he said. "My thought process was something like 'I'm too young to have this.'"

Bussard was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease, a form of cancer that attacks the lymphatic system, during his junior year of high school.

He found a dime-size lump on his collar bone, and a biopsy determined it was cancer. The cancer was between the second and third stages of development, which means it had spread to his lymph nodes, his spleen and liver.

"It was really scary because I just found a lump, but it had already spread," he said. "Who knows how long I had it."

After being diagnosed, Bussard went through six months of chemotherapy.

He lost his hair. He was too tired to stay on the basketball team.

And while he stayed on the golf team, he said, he didn't play well.

School also was sometimes a struggle.

The treatment, he said, wasn't bad at first, but by the final months, he was sick most of the time and tired even more often.

"It was hard, but it could have been worse," he said. "Other people have had it much worse."

Bussard has been cancer-free since the summer of 1999. That doesn't mean it won't come back, though, he said.

Generally, he said, if patients make it to five years with no signs of cancer, the chances of it coming back are greatly decreased.

It never really is over though, Bussard said.

"I'll have to go in for yearly checkups for the rest of my life," he said.

But that's not a big deal, he said.

He's well aware it could have been worse.

And even more aware that had he been diagnosed 20 or 30 years ago, his chance of survival wouldn't have been so high.

"That's why it's important to be involved in fund-raising efforts," he said.

"Nowadays, anyone can get cancer, and we need money to do research and research to find a cure."

He said he felt lucky that he was diagnosed with a form of cancer that has a 90-percent survival rate. Not all cancer survival rates are that high, he said.

But with more research, he said he hopes survival rates for all types of cancer continue to increase.

"One day, I hope they find a cure for cancer," he said, "and everyone's story has a happy ending."

Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity 25th Anniversary 1978-2003

The Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden is the diamond-shaped feature at the center of the K-State Gardens' phase 2 construction plan.

Pi Kappa Phi Fraternity, established at K-State in April 1978, celebrates its 25th anniversary with the gift of this red rose garden for the university community to enjoy.

The students and alumni of Pi Kappa Phi raised $29,000 in gifts and pledges to donate the garden to Kansas State University in memory of Claudene Pillsbury, who served as their housemother from 1984 until a week before her death in 2000.

The Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden is the largest gift of its kind to K-State by a student organization according to the KSU Foundation. University Facilities officials say it will be the first campus landmark named for a fraternity or sorority. The red rose garden, which will be located in the K-State Gardens on Denison Avenue, features the fraternity's flower. The diamond-shaped garden measures 75 feet on each side and resembles the shape of the Pi Kappa Phi membership pin, the Black Diamond.

TO THE POINT

News coverage determined by viewer interest

The war in Iraq is over, and Americans have moved on to indulging themselves in the Laci Peterson murder case.

Viewers criticize the news media for covering cases like Gary Condit or the Elizabeth Smart kidnapping and claim they don't want to know the details of people's personal lives, yet we sit in front of the TV for hours as the stories unfold.

Cable news networks like MSNBC, CNN and Fox News must respond to viewers to stay in business. Like it or not, journalism is a business, and corporate ownerships seek ratings.

But, if Americans showed interest in more pertinent issues, news channels would respond accordingly. There will always be a murder case, kidnapping or unusual court case. Those are not the issues the American public should be concerning themselves with.

Our nation's image in the eyes of Middle Eastern countries has been shattered, Israel and Palestine are still at war, and terrorist cells are still plotting ways to attack Americans. These issues affect our personal lives and jeopardize our security.

As concerned Americans, we must demand coverage of the issues that really do matter.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Nothing's corny if it gets you laid.

The Collegian finally came in useful. It makes an excellent umbrella.

You know you're still drunk in the morning when every single girl on campus is hot.

Is it wrong that my girlfriend gets mad that I'm in the Blotter more than I'm in the Fourum.

I love the rain. That means I get to go outside and splash in the puddles like I did when I was a kid.

If smoking is wrong, then I don't want to be right.

Killer boots, man.

SAVE OUR ANIMALS

Americans should unite against drilling for oil in wildlife habitats

To the average American, the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) is little more than a barren patch of ice which caribou migrate through. Why should the bill to drill there be such a big issue? Why should it even matter to Joe Schmoe America?

The Arctic National Wildlife Refuge is a national park set aside by President Dwight D. Eisenhower in 1960 to preserve the area for future generations. An untouched wilderness, it is a refuge for many animals, including the Porcupine Caribou herd, polar bears, musk oxen, Dall sheep, birds of prey and many other species of animals.

The area under consideration for drilling is between 600,000 and 700,000 hectares of the 19-million acre refuge, though the "footprint of production" is meant to be only 2,000 acres, a seemingly trivial amount.

Most people don't see how this is an issue. They think "my gas costs too much, the Middle East is being a pain, go ahead and drill so long as my gas is cheaper and I can drive my SUV to the curb and back without denting my wallet." What they don't realize is how big of an effect drilling will actually have.

One of the main reasons environmentalists oppose drilling in ANWR is the obvious fact that it is a pristine and untouched wilderness, a safe haven, if you will, for the local animal herds and natives who also call the refuge home.

Didn't know there were people living up there, did you? They've been conveniently forgotten in all the bantering between oil and environmental lobbyists. When they actually are mentioned, it is said that the locals are in favor of drilling as it will give them jobs, but what isn't said is there are two tribes. One stands to benefit. The other will lose.

The tribe that lives on the coast is in favor of the drilling, but it's funny how no one ever mentions how greatly they opposed the drilling proposal when it was for offshore drilling. Offshore drilling would have disrupted the migrating patterns of the whales they hunt for food, just as it will disrupt the caribou herds the more-inland tribe depends on for food.

Environmentalists also oppose the oil-drilling proposal because no one knows exactly how much oil there is on the North Slope. It is estimated that there are between 5.7 and 16 billion barrels, though environmentalists claim there is even less, only about 3.2 billion, a six-month supply at best. They argue that in the grand scheme of things, it is not worth the destruction of one of America's last wild places for such a meager amount of crude oil.

What do I think? I think drilling in ANWR is a bad idea, and not just because I'm environment-minded. Sure, it's going to have a negative impact on the animals and people of the area.

A major rupture or even small leaks would be disastrous to the fragile tundra ecosystem. My concern is the encouragement of our dependence on oil.

It's a fact everyone knows. Oil is a non-renewable resource. Once it's gone, we won't be getting any more for quite a long time, unless someone decides to give Jurassic Park a try. The Chem 230 textbooks last semester projected our current oil supply will last us 50 years if we're lucky. A gloom-and-doom projection, but the message is quite clear.

We're running out. OPEC is coming to terms with this as are many of our major oil companies. They're realizing they're running out of a product and want to make as much off of it as they can without having to shift production types to fuels such as ethanol or develop hydrogen fuels just yet. Changing your product takes money, something Big Oil doesn't like to give up.

We need to decrease our dependence on oil, and drilling in ANWR is not going to help us. It's going to hinder us. If gas prices went back down to $1.20, would you even care about alternative energy sources? Of course not.

No one but the hardcore hippie tree huggers would. (No offense, I'm one too.) It's a fact that we are a money-driven society as well as a lazy one. Nothing is going to make Americans change their ways unless it's cheaper, requires less effort or doesn't involve getting out of the Lazy Boy.

Drilling for oil in ANWR is only going to encourage our irresponsible use of energy and pollute our environment more. It will hold our country back in the world of progress, and we'll be kicking ourselves for it in the long run. Do yourself and your progeny a favor and write our senators today. The bill is moving through the Senate right now, and the Republicans are just itching to get George to sign it, whom also stands to benefit when his oil stocks sky rocket.

Drilling in ANWR is a bad idea. Let's propel ourselves into the future of energy and leave the North Slope to the caribou.

New Palestinian leader presents challenge for peace

Anybody remember when the Israelis and the Palestinians were actually having peace talks?

They've been killing each other in a renewed wave of violence for so long now that it's hard to recall the "good ol' days" when Bill Clinton, Benjamin Netanyahu and Yasser Arafat would stroll across the White House lawn together.

The 1993 Oslo Accords seem like ancient history, and the current uprising, which until recently showed no signs of ending soon, is already approaching the notoriety of the late 1980s intifada.

I say "until recently" because there may be light at the end of the tunnel. A deadlock within the Palestinian government ended earlier this week. Now all the criteria have been met for President Bush to reveal his "road map" for peace and pave the way for Palestinian statehood.

Of course, it's never really that simple. The deadlock revolved around a Cabinet appointment, which was filled by a man who is basically a professional terrorist.

"Professional" in the sense that terrorism isn't just an activity for Mohammed Dahlan — it's a way of life.

Dahlan, the newly appointed Palestinian security minister, gained notoriety while serving as a security chief in the Gaza Strip. There he allegedly helped plan many suicide bombings against Israeli targets.

Dahlan is believed to primarily be responsible for allying the extremist groups Hamas and Islamic Jihad with Arafat's Fatah movement.

Basically, he was one of Arafat's top lieutenants on the terror side of Fatah's operations.

Ironically, Arafat was opposed to Dahlan heading up the entire Palestinian security operation. Even more surprisingly, Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon supports his appointment to a position that would make him responsible for fighting terror.

It remains to be seen whether Dahlan can curb the influence of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, influence that he once helped to improve.

Why is there this illogical contradiction in the positions of Arafat and Sharon?

For Arafat, it is ultimately a case of trust and influence.

He no longer trusts Dahlan, who has been developing new business contacts, building his own power base and generally becoming more of a rival.

This is not unprecedented. The new Palestinian prime minister, Mahmoud Abbas, was once a co-founder of Fatah with Arafat, and the two were close allies. But the deadlock was between these two; Abbas wanted Dahlan, Arafat did not.

So, Arafat has turned on two former associates who have gained enough power to supplant him as the chief leader and spokesman of the Palestinians.

Even when pressured to name a prime minister, few thought Arafat would just step aside and fade into the shadows.

Abbas realized this after two weeks on the job, threatening to resign when it became obvious Arafat does not intend to relinquish any power.

Of course, this is all pleasing to Sharon, who like every other world leader is probably sick and tired of dealing with Arafat. For decades, the man has thwarted plans for lasting peace, and he probably won't stop anytime soon.

To Sharon, Dahlan is the ideal choice if he truly embraces his responsibilities. He knows more about Palestinian terror than most, and he is one of the few Palestinian leaders strong enough to take terrorists on without fear.

Or he can use the position's influence to continue sheltering and supporting Hamas and Islamic Jihad, derailing future peace talks like his mentor Arafat and becoming the new intractable face of Palestinian nationalism.

In case you're wondering, Bush, the State Department and prominent Israeli leaders share my skepticism of Dahlan's fitness to be an effective leader for peace. His terrorist connections and shady business dealings make the peace process seem like a dishonest farce.

But they all accept that the new Palestinian leaders must be chosen by the Palestinians, so their displeasure means little. Having a barely-reformed terrorist like Arafat in power for years hasn't stopped the peace process from getting this far, so maybe there is little Dahlan can do to halt further progress.

And maybe peace talks will be the hope of the future, not obscure memories from the past.

Professor studies effects of online buying

By Tony Stilwell
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Being able to order a jersey with your name and number. Looking at different styles of diamonds to find that perfect engagement ring.

The recent customization of online purchasing has taken students — and one teacher — by storm.

Janis Crow, marketing instructor, performed an experiment involving three different products and the ability to customize them to fit the buyer's needs. Products included pizza, a pair of shoes and a personal digital assistant. Participants in the experiment, which included 31 students, were able to customize their product or were given the choice to use computer-given suggestions.

Crow designed the experiments to see what factors influence how consumers customize their products. The studies will aid in developing technologies that help in certain decision-making processes when there are multiple customizable options.

"Just because online purchasing is different, it draws a lot of interest to it," she said. "It will continue to grow."

Crow said her reasoning behind the future growth lies in the broad spectrums of users that are purchasing online. Purchases no longer are made by middle-age and wealthy buyers, she said, but by younger age groups, notably college students.

Trisha Wagner, junior in human ecology, said she prefers shopping online because of the option of customizing products.

"I like being able to be picky," she said. "I like the convenience. If I don't have the time, ordering specific outfits online helps. I can get done what could take hours in just minutes, and my choices are endless."

Crow said she has produced two main observations during her experiments.

She said the products selected by the buyer are more likely to be purchased than if they were not customized.

In addition, Crow said the buyer is more likely to purchase a product with preferable defaults when there is a multitude of customizable choices to make.

may break out any moment due to the U.S. moves," the North's KCNA news agency.

It said relations with the United States had hit "rock bottom" because President Bush named North Korea as part of an "axis of evil," along with Iran and Iraq.

KCNA said the war in Iraq had shown the only way for a country to protect itself was to have a strong military deterrent.

Officials from Seoul and Washington say the swift U.S.-led victory in Iraq prompted North Korea to agree to the nuclear talks.

The North's Korea People's Army vowed to "put all people under arms and turn the whole country into a fortress."

On a smaller note, $407,000 was allotted to increase the minimum wage for student hourly employees. These funds would increase the wage from its current level of $5.15 per hour to $5.75 per hour.

In addition, $390,000 would go toward the increase salaries for the budgeted use of graduate teaching assistant, graduate research assistant and graduate assistant positions. These funds would increase the salaries of these positions by about 7.5 percent.

Along with these fees, $398,500 was included for other student initiatives, such as the Global Education Initiative.

Student Body President John O'Hara said he appreciated all the hard work student senators put into the proposals.

"I would like to express my gratitude not only to administration but to each student who attended each meeting," he said. "We consistently had 12 to 15 students every week."

Krause and Rawson also addressed the tuition increase for the fiscal year 2004.

According to the proposal, an undergraduate resident will pay $117 per credit hour, with nonresidents paying $380 per credit hour. In addition, the colleges of Business Administration and Engineering will increase an additional $5 per credit hour.

Salina's tuition will also increase to $114 per credit hour, Rawson said.

O'Hara said that during the past two years, most of the student body has seen an increase of 51 percent, with students in the colleges of Business Administration and Engineering increasing 63 percent.

"We need to be concerned with the increase in tuition," he said. "We need to make sure we're making it accessible to attend Kansas State University."

LECTURE | Banfield emphasizes objective coverage on world issues

Banfield said there is a difference between journalism and coverage, and the embedded reporters were a prime example of the difference.

"Getting access does not mean getting the story," she said.

"It just means we are getting one more arm of the story, and that is what we got. And it was a glorious, wonderful picture that had a lot of people watching and a lot of advertisers excited about cable news."

Because of that wonderful picture, Banfield said she wonders if Americans would be open to fighting another war.

"I am not so sure that we in America are hesitant to do this again, to fight another war, because it looked like a glorious and courageous and so successful, terrific endeavor," she said. "We got rid of horrible leadership, got rid of a dictator, got rid of a monster, but we didn't hear the civilians' opinions. We didn't see the bodies."

Banfield said to understand truly what war is about, journalists must cover both sides of an issue, and in many reports on cable television, only the American side was aired.

"So many voices were silenced," she said. "We did wonderful things. We freed the Iraqi people, and many of those people, by the way, were quite thankful for that. There has to be a reason, and the reason for it is because we don't have a very good image right now overseas."

"What you read in the newspapers and what you see on cable is not what they see there. We can't blame these poor people for not liking the United States. All they know is we are crusaders ... All they know is that we want their oil. They are very suspect to who these new liberators are."

But the cable news reporters might never have the chance to finish this story, Banfield said, because of viewer ratings.

"When I say the war is over, I kind of mean that in the sense that in the past few days the numbers are falling off the ratings chart," she said.

"We plummeted into the basement the last week. We went from millions of viewers to just a few hundred thousand. Did we suddenly become boring? Did we suddenly lose our flair?"

"No. I just think people had enough."

Banfield said that in a three-week campaign, the American public saw more minutes of news on the Iraq war than it ever saw in years of coverage of Vietnam. And her concern now is that those same viewers will quickly forget.

"I think we reached the saturation point faster because you just get so much so fast," she said.

"They have had enough, and now the story is gone. When is the last time you saw a news report about Afghanistan? It was only a year ago, and viewers are not demanding it."

If viewers were interested, the networks would cover it, she said.

"I am desperately depressed that it has come to this — that it has come to the American shores," Banfield said.

"But, it is important for your safety, and your future, and your world and your children that we continue to want and know what is happening overseas when our troops leave. It is important that we still demand coverage of those things."

The sixth-seeded Wildcats will face No. 3 Texas for the second time this week when the two teams meet at 4:30 p.m. today at the Plaza Tennis Center.

Coach Steve Bietau said he was happy with the win but added he would have preferred a better outing.

"I'm pleased to win and to get to the quarters and get another shot at Texas," Bietau said. "At this point of the season, I would prefer that we were playing more efficiently, and I think there was a lack of willingness to adjust to some things today that made the match a little tougher than it needed to be."

Lacrosse goes to Missouri to end perfect season

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The top-ranked, undefeated K-State lacrosse team will attempt to win the inaugural Division B Great Rivers Lacrosse Conference Championship this weekend in St. Charles, Mo.

The Wildcats earned a first-round bye and will play either Dordt College or Kansas on Saturday. Should they win, they will play for the title Sunday.

Senior captain Shane Apple said the conference championship is the team's ultimate goal.

"It'll be one of the highest honors we can achieve," Apple said. "We've been in other leagues, but they weren't as competitive as what we are in now."

The GRLC is comprised of 21 schools, six in Division A and 15 in Division B. Illinois, Iowa and Missouri are among those in Division A while K-State's opposition includes Kansas, Northwestern and Nebraska in Division B.

K-State's 8-0 record sparkles with wins over the Huskers, Creighton and Dordt. The Cats beat KU 6-5 on April 5.

"It's always a tough, physical game when we play them," sophomore Justin Smith said. "It's one of those that came down to the last seconds in every game."

A club team, Wildcat lacrosse boasts a roster of nearly 30 players, with hometowns ranging from North Carolina to Michigan. Most of the players are instate products, though.

"Talent wise, players coming from the East Coast are going to have more experience," Apple said. "The talent you're able to bring in from that area will help the players from Kansas to develop more. But the reason we have such a good team now is we have that very dedicated, Midwestern work ethic."

The Wildcats are led by Apple and junior Tim Van Wye. Apple leads the league in assists while Van Wye leads the team in scoring.

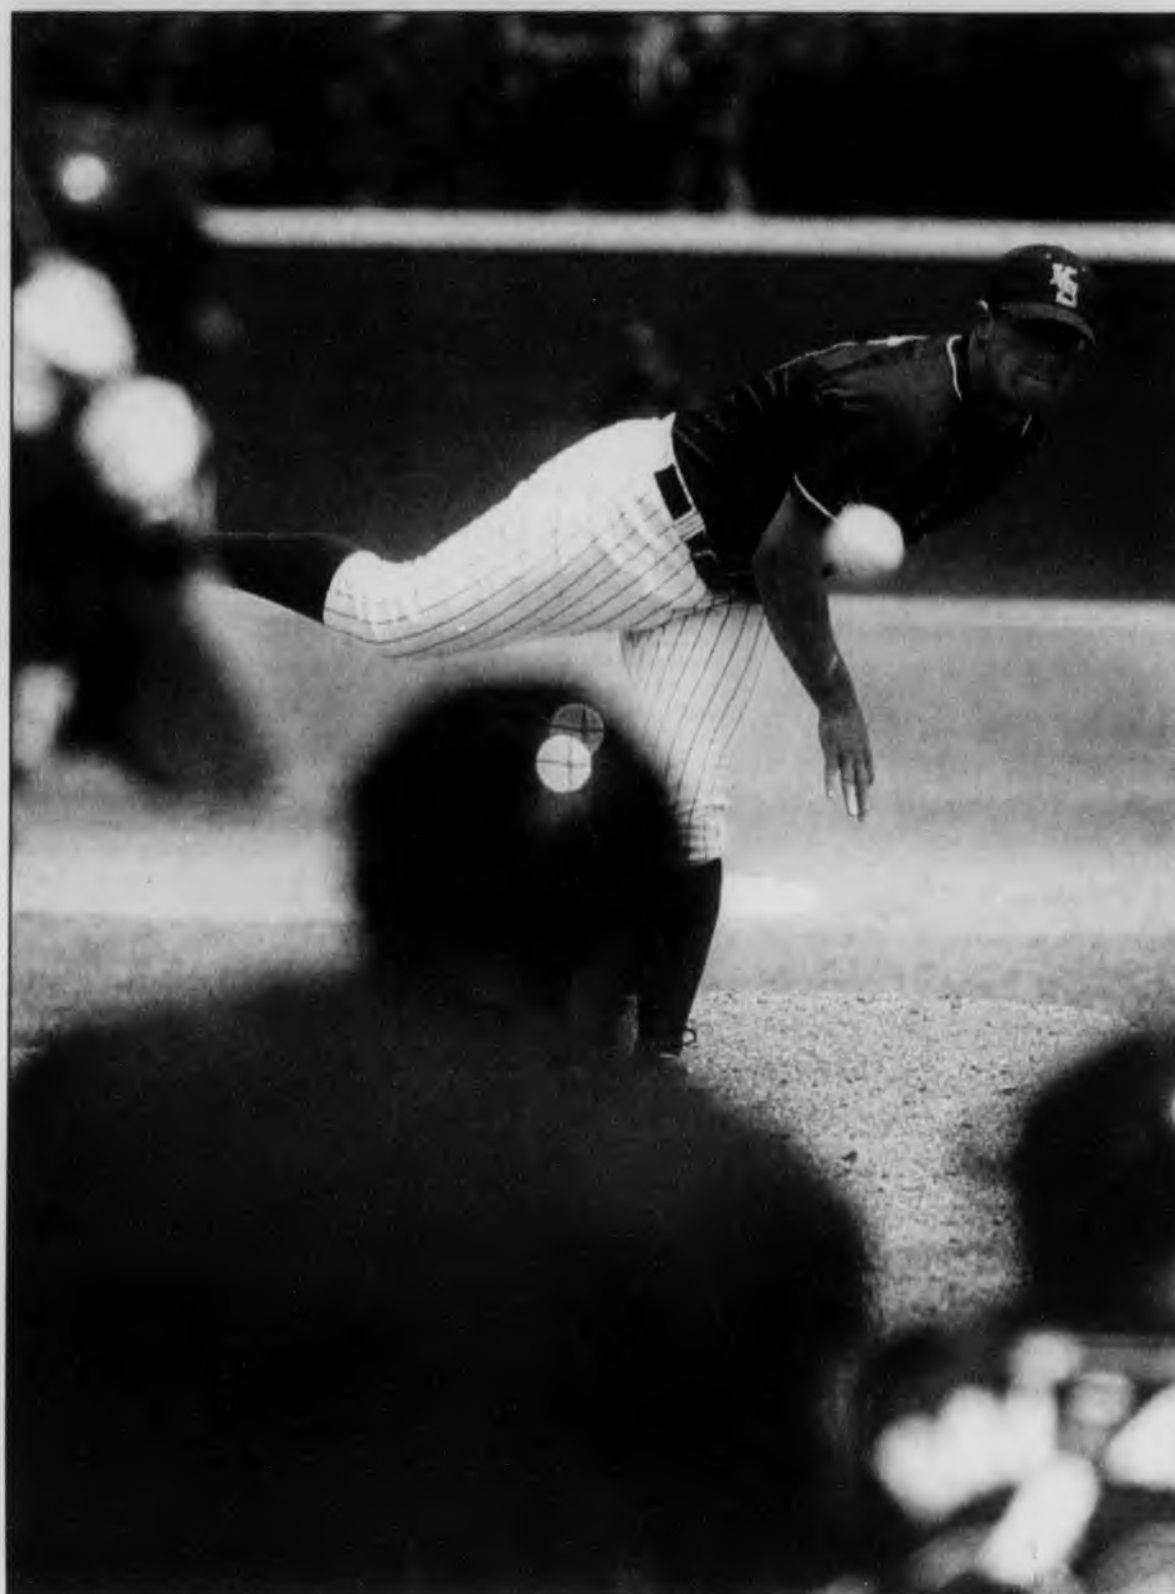

The Cats also boast two of the league's top three goalies in freshman Matt Wibbenmeyer and sophomore Paul Morizzo.

That youthful influx allowed K-State to improve from last year's 7-2 mark.

As K-State prepares for the conference tournament, Apple hopes the Wildcats' success will lead to increased excitement, participation, and funding.

"This is the first time we've ever been undefeated," Apple said. "That just says a lot about our team. Going into this weekend, we have nothing but positive thoughts."

Cats to lock horns with Texas this weekend

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coach Mike Clark knows his Wildcats are scheduled to play three games with conference co-leader Texas this weekend in Austin.

When it comes to pitching, though, Clark is content with addressing only the first two of those contests.

"We're going to do whatever we can to win those first two games," Clark said.

Anything, Clark said, including using projected Sunday starter Andrew Ehling out of the bullpen.

For a staff already thin on healthy arms, that could put even more pressure on Friday and Saturday starters Kevin Melcher and Jim Ripley to keep Clark from looking for help early in ballgames.

If last weekend's success against Texas Tech was any indication, though, Melcher and Ripley should have no problem holding their own.

"We feel like if they'll compete like they did in the strike zone, they're going to be very effective," Clark said.

Southeast Missouri State's Gary Gilbert slides back into first base as K-State first baseman Tim Doty catches a pick-off throw during the Cats' 9-5 loss at Tointon Family Stadium on Tuesday.

Ripley and Melcher pitched the Cats into the seventh in each of K-State's wins over the Red Raiders, allowing Clark's oft-used bullpen some needed rest.

Against the Horns (32-13, 13-5) this weekend, K-State (12-26, 2-13) will need similar performances.

Texas comes into the series as the winner in 11 of its last 13 contests and ranked ninth nationally.

Wildcats need Shum-like effort against Longhorns

His name is Jim Shum.

A high school wrestling teammate of mine, Shum was damned to be a poor competitor from the beginning.

With a fiery temper and a propensity for running into things (I once saw the guy give himself a concussion on a goalpost while trying to track down a wind-blown algebra assignment), Jim had his problems on the mat.

One year after I'd graduated and came to K-State, news from Marysville wafted south and I heard Shum's senior campaign was going as badly as everything else in his grappling career had gone to that point.

The poor soul had lost 16 matches in a row — a school record — and was inconsolable.

Friends reported to me that he had been seen on local backroads, traveling at break-neck speeds on a shoddy dirtbike he'd pieced together from abandoned boat and lawnmower parts — a frightening concept given Jim's history of crashing without the aid of a vehicle.

But ol' Jimmy was a fighter. And he did the unthinkable.

Fueled by potentially lethal doses of Gatorade and saltine crackers, Shum won 12 matches in a row and became the first wrestler in Kansas history diagnosed with acute balance and environmental negotiation disorder to win a state championship.

It's quite a story, yes, and all true, but you may be asking yourself why you just read about it. The answer is I've been watching a good deal of K-State baseball.

And if you haven't noticed, the Wildcats are going to need a Shum-like effort to turn their season around and get into the Big 12 Tournament.

K-State, after dumping a non-conference game to 2002 Ohio Valley Conference champ Southeast Missouri State, is now 12-26, 2-13 in the Big 12.

Worse, the hapless Cats will be traveling to Austin, Texas, this weekend to face the defending national champion and heartless-opponent-devouring-ridiculously-large-athletic-budget-flexing Longhorns, a group sitting at 32-13, ranked No. 9 in the country.

Bright spots if you're in K-State's dugout? Few and far between. But third baseman Zack

MLB | Another cell phone incident

San Diego Padres third basemen Sean Burroughs said he was hit by a cell phone thrown from the stands at Wrigley Field during Thursday's game.

Burroughs said the phone hit him in the right foot shortly after the Cubs' Mark Grudzielanek grounded out in the bottom of the eighth inning.

"It shocked me," Burroughs said. "It could have been worse, it could have hit me in the head."

He blamed immature fans.

Major league baseball intends to go ahead with all its games in Toronto, despite a SARS outbreak there, but advised players to be cautious about personal hygiene.

"We have a lot of concerns but we also don't want to overreact," Commissioner Bud Selig said Thursday.

"We are very sensitive and I am very concerned, but at this point our own doctors are telling us not to do anything differently," Selig told a group of Associated Press sports editors. "The advice we're getting internally is to proceed. Proceed with caution, but proceed."

NBA | Stoudamire earns Rookie of the Year

Amare Stoudemire won the NBA Rookie of the Year award Thursday, the first player to do so after coming to the league directly from high school.

The Phoenix Suns forward — quick, powerful and barely out of his teens — beat out Houston Rockets center Yao Ming, last year's No. 1 draft pick.

Stoudemire received 458 points, including 59 of a possible 117 first-place votes, in balloting by sports writers and broadcasters. Yao finished with 405 points. Caron Butler of Miami was third with 179.

The players received five points for a first-place vote, three for second and one for third.

NBA | Celtics' Blount ejected

Boston Celtics center Mark Blount was ejected from Thursday night's playoff game against Indiana for a flagrant foul against Jermaine O'Neal.

As O'Neal was going up for a shot with 10:49 left in the second quarter, Blount blocked it and knocked him to the floor. O'Neal was restrained by players while Blount backed away. Ron Artest hit Blount's chest before order was restored.

Blount was assessed a flagrant-2 foul, which calls for an automatic ejection and two free throws and the ball for Indiana.

Artest, the NBA leader in flagrant fouls, was not called for a foul.

Modeling itself after book, 'Holes' proves humorous, sensitive "Holes" functions a lot like a good book — doling out information piece by piece, then allowing it all to finally amass into one complete, cohesive tale. This should come as no surprise, considering the screenplay is written by Louis Sachar, author of the Newberry Award-winning book of the same name.

The action starts off fast. We are introduced to Stanley Yelnats (Shia LaBeouf, television's "Freaks and Geeks" and "Even Stevens"), an average kid who happens to have very bad luck. The family attributes the haplessness of male Yelnatses to a curse placed on Stanley's great-great-grandfather.

Stanley is falsely accused of stealing a pair of shoes belonging to a famous basketball player (they actually fall mysteriously out of the sky onto Stanley's head) and is sent to Camp Greenlake, somewhere in the middle of Texas. However, nothing is green, and there is no lake at this camp.

The boys at the camp are supervised by Mr. Sir (Jon Voight, "Ali"), a sunflower-seed-chewing grouch. Each day, they are sent out to the dried-up lake bottom in orange jumpsuits remis-cent of penitentiary uniforms. Every camper must dig one large hole a day. They are instructed to report anything they unearth so the warden (Sigourney Weaver, "Galaxy Quest," "Heartbreakers") can inspect their finds.

Stanley, initially an outcast at the camp, eventually is accepted by the others and earns a nickname, "Caveman." Along the way, he befriends the quietest boy at Camp Greenlake, Zero, and teaches him to read.

Throughout the film, flashbacks reveal more of the history surrounding Stanley's ancestors and the area of Texas where Camp Greenlake stands. The audience begins to learn how the main characters' fates are deeply intertwined.

Though much of the action seems bizarre at first, the offbeat characters and their compelling stories draw you in.

As pieces of the plot fall into place, it becomes evident that a lot of care went into creating the tale.

This newest Disney attempt excels on many levels.

The plot is captivating and fresh. The characters of both the past and the present deal with serious issues of acceptance, fairness and loyalty.

Furthermore, the acting is on target. The camp boys deliver simple, straightforward performances and project a believable camaraderie. Voight is careful not to take his character too seriously, which would be disastrous to the mood. As the warden, Weaver switches from seemingly sweet to dangerously cruel with ease.

Though LaBeouf does an adequate job as Stanley, the character isn't always entirely appealing. Some of Stanley's likability may have been lost in the conversion of the book to the screenplay.

Just as impressive as the acting is the film's attention to detail.

"Holes" is laced with threads of different story lines that, rather than getting dropped by the way-side, are neatly pulled back together by the end of the movie.

The main problem lies with the appropriateness of the content to the target audience. This movie has some very dark scenes featuring violence and racism. It may not be appropriate for children younger than 10.

"Holes" is well-crafted, humorous and sensitive. With its clean jokes and its serious ideas, this movie holds something for all ages.

Atmospheric angels: Trip-hop duo Frou Frou chills listeners

Imagine the coolest things you can think of, like the underside of a pillow, frost on a beer mug or glazed tree branches after an ice storm. That's what Frou Frou sounds like.

If you haven't heard the group's two singles (which I've only heard online), "Breathe In" and "Must Be Dreaming," you haven't heard some of the coolest, iciest pop songs in the history of cool, icy pop songs.

The rest of Frou Frou's debut album, "Details," is equally frosty, especially tracks like "Psychobabble" and "It's Good to be in Love."

Frou Frou essentially is two people: singer Imogen Heap and producer Guy Sigsworth, who has also produced Bjork and Madonna. Somehow, these two have created an entire symphony of sound with all the subtle texture of a wintry, cirrus cloud.

Heap's voice is a synonym for "heavenly," "angelic" and "ethereal." The music is all icicles, blips, bleeps, and strings. The lyrics are lullabies of love and loss.

With its angel, icicle and love/loss formula, a comparison to trip-hop groups such as Portishead and Morcheeba seems natural. Frou Frou, however, sounds more like Beth Orton and Dido, layering its pop and folk songs with subtle trip-hop atmosphere.

Like a painting of a candle and an artist in a room, "Details" is a chiaroscuro of shadows and light. The album sounds like a film noir score — with its shadowy heroine and the light in her eyes (and voice).

For such a cool album, it's warm like a glove. Listen to it in the dark, in your headphones, and its cool warmth makes the most sense in the world. "Details" enwraps you like a coat or a hug.

Listen to "Details" to let you down after partying. Listen to it as you do your most difficult homework. It's background music you can dance to, hum along with and get lost in.

Songs like "Let Go" and "s" chill you out. But it's "Breathe In" that you'll want to play on repeat. "I'm high enough from all the waiting," Heap sings, "to ride a wave on your inhaling." Exactly.

Alt-country progenitors find voice

There's something appropriate about releasing this album in April.

Not only the title of "Rainy Day Music" fits the month. The entire album makes you want to sit outside with the wet, green grass and smile about the bad things that have happened to you since the last spring and start over before life's opportunities slip away.

Spring has always been used as an analogy for starting something new, and that's what the Jayhawks are doing. And you don't have to dig too deep lyrically to see it.

In "Don't Let the World Get in Your Way," Gary Louris sings, "Like a flower in the spring / Left to the mercy of the season / soon the past will catch you up, stinging like a paper-cut / There's only so much in your veins to bleed / Don't let the world get in your way / Make your mistakes, go on your way."

It seems to be that attitude of ignoring the things in your past that hold you back and moving on that drives "Rainy Day Music."

This sound is a throw-back to the Jayhawks' starting point with beautiful two-part harmonies that sometimes recall Simon and Garfunkel and a country folk feel that leaves a Gram Parsons or Bob Dylan taste in your mouth. The stand-out "Don't Let the World Get in Your Way," even seems to pay tribute to David Bowie's older material.

People will make a lot of comparisons to some older music on this album, but that's OK. Where Wilco is pushing alt-country forward with its atmospheric "Yankee Hotel Foxtrot," the Jayhawks unabashedly wear their '60s and '70s influences on their sleeves.

The Jayhawks formed in Minneapolis in 1985 and helped begin a movement that revived folk country rock with other bands such as Uncle Tupelo.

So why don't many people talk about the Jayhawks anymore? That's because they haven't released an album since 2000's brit-pop-ish "Smile." And they haven't released an album that deserved much attention since 1994's "Tomorrow the Green Grass."

After "Tomorrow..." founding member Mark Olsen left the Jayhawks and the band never seemed to recover in its following shaky releases, headed up by lead vocalist/guitarist Gary Louris. In "Rainy Day Music," the Jayhawks head back to their roots and Gary Louris and bassist Mark Perlman spearhead a beautiful album that stands as a major success for a seasoned, experienced band.

The Jayhawks took the long way through all four seasons and have come back to a wet spring in "Rainy Day Music," starting over more or less where they began. When people later talk about the best Jayhawks' albums, this will likely be mentioned in the same sentence as "Hollywood Town Hall" and "Blue Earth."

Saunders was named the Big 12 Player of the Week on Tuesday after a dynamite weekend against Texas Tech.

And K-State did take the series from Tech, its first conference series win this year, so that's nice. But you still have to be asking yourself what has gone wrong with this team.

The future looked bright for the Wildcats going into 2003. Back for K-State were All-Big 12 sluggers Ty Soto and Pat Maloney, along with Honorable Mention All-Big 12 bat Tim Doty.

The Cats also returned gritty catcher Ryan Baldwin, everyday outfielder Gabe Luttrell, Mr. consistency Brett Williams and sure-handed Brandon "Boogie" Taylor to the lineup.

And with players like Brad Anzman, Terry Blunt, Brian Patty, Saunders, Jason Long, Marc Chabot and prize recruit Jared Bunn waiting to make their contributions, you had to like K-State's chances to make a run at another successful season.

The bullpen didn't exactly look weak either. K-State returned Jonathan Gutierrez, Kevin Melcher, and Eric Rollins, a group that combined to win 12 games for K-State a season ago, for 2003.

The Cats also added transfer Brett Bagley, a pitcher touted as one of 10 "Newcomers to Watch" in the Big 12 by the Dallas Morning News.

The Wildcats rank second to last in the Big 12 in team batting and are alone at the bottom of the league in team pitching, carrying a 7.12 team ERA, a mark well above ninth place Texas Tech's 5.52.

But it's not over yet. K-State made the conference tournament last year with a 13-13 mark in the Big 12. But with 12 remaining contests against Texas, Baylor, Oklahoma, and Kansas, one conference loss means a sub .500 year in the Big 12 for the Cats.

Could 12 in a row happen? Jim Shum did it, and he puts his life on the line every time he walks to class. Sure it could happen.

But I wouldn't bet my saltines on it.

12-leading 59 RBIs, and Street joins Majewski on the most recent Golden Spikes Award Watch List tracking the nation's top player.

"We're going to have to do a good job of keeping the score down and eliminating their scoring opportunities," Clark said.

K-State has an improving offense, led last week by Big 12 Player of the Week Zack Saunders, who has moved comfortably into the starting third base position after the Cats lost Ty Soto for the year due to a broken wrist.

"Since the injury, it's one of those things where sometimes necessity forces things on you, and it's a situation where he knew he had to step up," Clark said. "What he's doing doesn't surprise any of us."

Saunders hit three home runs last week, including a walk-off job in game one of the Cats' series with the Red Raiders on April 17.

That win was K-State's first in conference play this season, a far cry from Clark's preseason expectations.

Nevertheless, Clark's goals haven't dropped off too much. A Big 12 Tournament bid is still within grasp if the Cats catch fire in the conference season's second half, he said.

Success, Clark said, will come if the team commits to working hard this weekend.

"I really don't want the guys to concentrate on the winning right now because I just want them to go out and play solid baseball," he said.

With series remaining with Oklahoma and Kansas, the teams ahead of the Cats in the Big 12 standings, a return trip to the Big 12 Tournament isn't completely out of sight.

"As long as we're putting the spikes on and the kids play hard," Clark said, "it's a matter of us playing good enough baseball in order to win enough ballgames to get there."

back, sweeping the next three singles points to clinch the match.

The Big 12 Championship is scored differently than regular season competition. The first team to four points wins the match. This puts more of an emphasis on the doubles point, an area the Cats will look for continued success in against the Longhorns.

K-State swept the doubles point from Texas on Sunday, including a victory from Sedlmajerova and Castillejos over the nation's No. 19 doubles team of Texas' Ziva Grasic and Kendra Strohm. Despite the dominance in doubles competition, Texas won the match 4-3.

Bietau said he is looking forward to seeing how his team fares in today's rematch.

"We're in a spot to play a big match against a very good team," Bietau said.

"We are excited and looking forward to a great match today."

MARCH | Women to unite

"Anyone in the world is allowed to attend the rally and the concert," she said. "But only women are allowed to march."

Janette said she encourages men to support the women at the end of the march.

This is the first year for the Men's Circle, which is not sponsored by Ordinary Women.

Joni Redmond, junior in theater and English, said she also is excited about the Men's Circle.

"Men can also stand along the marching path and support the women along the way," she said.

Redmond, Ordinary Women member, said the march has literal and symbolic meanings.

"It's literal because women should be able to walk at night and feel safe," she said.

"It's symbolic because we're afraid when we shouldn't have to be."

Pi Kappa Phi Celebrates 25th, Gives Largest Student Gift to K-State

The men of Pi Kappa Phi fraternity at K-State are giving the campus a red rose garden to celebrate the 25th anniversary of their founding in 1978. The students and alumni raised nearly $29,000 in gifts and pledges for the K-State Gardens.

"This is the largest capital gift of its kind to K-State by a student organization," said Julie Lea, director of communications at the KSU Foundation.

The Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden also will be the first campus landmark named for a fraternity or sorority, according to Mark Taussig of the K-State facilities planning office.

A groundbreaking ceremony for the rose garden is at 5 p.m. on Saturday, April 26th. Tours of the K-State Gardens on Denison Avenue begin at 4:30 p.m. This is one of several anniversary weekend events marking the Pi Kappa Phi's founding, said the chapter's historian John Schalekamp, senior in architectural engineering. Other 25th anniversary weekend events include a black-tie Rose Ball at the K-State Alumni Center, a golf tournament at Colbert Hills golf course and tailgating in CarTown before the spring football game.

Mark Timmes of Charlotte, North Carolina, the fraternity's national chief executive officer, will attend the event and present the Silver Legion Award to the founders of the K-State chapter. The award recognizes alumni for their 25 years of membership in the greater fraternity.

The work to give a rose garden to the university began shortly after the 20th anniversary celebration in 1998, said Tim Lindemuth, the fraternity's chapter advisor. The student officers and members of the alumni board approved the plan. They secured approvals from the K-State horticulture department for the construction and from the KSU Foundation to raise the funds.

The rose garden also serves as a memorial to Claudene Pillsbury, longtime housemother to Pi Kappa Phi, who passed away in 2000 after serving as housemother since 1984.

The design of the Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden is diamond-shaped and measures approximately 75 feet on each side. The red rose is the fraternity's flower, and the diamond mirrors the shape of the fraternity's membership pin known as the Black Diamond.

"It has been a tradition of Pi Kappa Phi to give a symbol of thanks to their university," Timmes said. "This rose garden will be a lasting symbol for the past, present and future members of the fraternity to appreciate and for the entire K-State community to enjoy."

Faculty Member of the Month

April's faculty of the month nominee has been nominated more times than any other professor on this campus. It is Kelly Welch, and she was nominated this month by the Alpha Tau Omega fraternity. Dr. Welch is the Human Development instructor here on this campus. Dr. Welch possesses all of the qualities that a college professor needs to be effective. She has humor, intelligence, and she is very well known around this campus for her fun, unique teaching style. She knows exactly how to keep her students involved and wanting to come to class.

Dr. Welch uses life experiences in her classes, which make them more appealing to her students. She makes her class enjoyable to attend on a daily basis. She encourages students to attend class with her in-class assignments. She brings in children to help students better understand the material that she is teaching them. Her real life examples bring a little bit of humor to her class, which helps even more to engage her students in learning.

Dr. Welch has had to deal with many different things in her life, including cancer. She brings all of her past experiences to the classroom to help others to utilize them to solve problems in their own lives. She is always around and available to talk with her students. Her class is usually very popular, which fills her waitlists each semester. On behalf of the Greek and Kansas State community, would like to thank Dr. Kelly Welch for her continued dedication to this college, and for making this campus a better place to be!

Greek of the Month

April's Greek of the Month award winner goes to Alpha Chi Omega's Erica Voran. Erica is 4.0 GPA sophomore majoring in Elementary Education with a minor in Spanish. Erica currently holds a position within her chapter known as Vice President of Communications. Through this position, Erica is responsible for communication with other sororities, as well as within her chapter. Within the past month, Erica has been kept busy with making a spreadsheet of all of the member's summer contact information. She has also been helping to welcome the rotating roommates that all of the sororities recently housed with goodies. She has been writing thank you notes to all of the chapters that participated recently in their philanthropy and has been preparing information for their national headquarters. Since homecoming pairings have been announced, Erica has been even busier trying to work with other girls in the house and their homecoming partners to prepare for next fall's activities.

Outside of her sorority, Erica is involved in many different activities. She has been involved on campus as a McCain Ambassador, where she volunteers to be an usher for many productions. She has also helped the local community for two years by serving as a Girl Scout Troop leader for a troop in Manhattan. She says that her troop has taught her more about children, which has in turn helped her with her studies.

Erica is a member of the National Society of Collegiate Scholars. Also, she is the recipient of the National Society of Collegiate Scholar's Merit award. She recently has been named as the recipient of the Tomorrow's Teachers Scholarship and as Sophomore of the Year by her chapter. Outside of her busy schedule, Erica enjoys taking pictures and scrap booking. She likes to spend time and play cards with friends and family and work out often.

In the future, Erica hopes to utilize all of her leadership skills to become more involved in new and exciting activities. We congratulate Erica and thank her for being one of the top leaders on campus. Erica, we wish you luck in the future with your future endeavors and know that you are one of the top up and coming leaders both in the Greek and entire K-State community!

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN SPRING GAME

Pair expected to excel in 2003 season

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Del Miller was named K-State's offensive coordinator for the second time in his life last winter.

Originally, he followed Coach Bill Snyder from Iowa in 1989 and stayed on the Wildcat staff until 1994.

His teams featured a wide-open passing attack anchored by drop-back style quarterbacks like Paul Watson and Chad May, and straight-forward running from backs like Eric Gallon and J.J. Smith.

But Eli Roberson and Darren Sproles won't leave him reminiscing of those days anytime soon.

Roberson and Sproles may play a bit differently than May and Smith, but that's OK with Miller.

"It's relieving," he said. "It just adds another dimension when other teams know you can bounce out there and hit them big."

Roberson and Sproles bounced out to account for 73 percent of K-State's ground attack last year, and Roberson tacked on 1,580 yards through the air.

Together, the duo had its hands in three of every four yards the Wildcats gained.

So it shouldn't have come as much of a surprise when ESPN's Gameday crew pointed to them as the Cats' leaders and as possibly the best running duo in the nation.

Roberson said that this season they're above all of the national hype.

"As far as me and him and all the hype, we know what we got. People will say what they want to say," Roberson said. "If Sproles rushed for 50 yards, they would say we were the worst backfield, so we don't really worry about it."

Last year, they kept defenses off balance by threatening attack in many different ways.

Together, they ran the option. There were quarterback draws designed specifically for Roberson. Sproles ran in the face of critics and proved he was tough enough to go up the middle. Roberson found his rhythm and passing arm and increased his completion percentage by nearly 13 points.

And Roberson said they could be even better

Spring Game ignites interest in some Wildcat fans, but not in others

Springtime football game provides relief for fans ready for Cat action

"In West Canaan, Texas, football is a way of life." That's one of the opening lines of James Van Der Beek's character, Jonathan Moxley, in the movie "Varsity Blues." Besides, I have been promising my friends all this year that I would somehow work that quote into one of my columns. "Mox" could have easily been describing the Little Apple — Manhattan.

That's why tomorrow is one of the few dates I have circled on my calendar during the spring besides my fiancée's birthday and graduation day. Tomorrow is, of course, the Spring Game.

It's a day I've been looking forward to since I was in San Diego on Friday, Dec. 27, 2002, celebrating K-State's win over Arizona State in the Pacific Life Holiday Bowl.

In other words, all the purple faithful have had to endure almost four whole months since seeing our beloved Wildcats play football.

That's four months without following the Cats and everything that goes along with it.

Four months of not watching nearly every college football game in the country.

Four months of not having much to write about as a Collegian sports writer preoccupied with K-State football.

That's four months without even getting to see a jailbreak screen or the 4-3 defense executed to perfection.

Four months of not gearing up each week for a Saturday tailgate. The tailgate only including O'Doul's, like my colleague Dana said. O'Doul's: the beverage of choice of every K-State student in the parking lot, since college students never break the law.

Seriously, the Spring Game is always an exciting day. Even though it's just a scrimmage, with no other team, the 2003 march to the national championship at the Sugar Bowl in New Orleans begins tomorrow. For a mere two bucks, students can see two possible Heisman Trophy candidates practice their craft.

Not only do we have the opportunity to check out 12 returning starters, but we also get to see the newcomers. You can get a feel of who is going to step up and take the place of an early NFL departure and graduating seniors.

This year's spring game is chalk full of potential starters getting to strut their stuff and gain some momentum while finishing out spring ball.

One major question mark is who will replace a likely first-round NFL draft pick, Terence Newman. With his former cornerback position open, much speculation surrounds who will get the starting role.

The other key positions are at free safety, defensive tackle, defensive end, middle linebacker, wide receiver, punter and along the offensive line.

It's forgivable for Dana and other students to be at home on the couch during the Spring Game. I know the only reason a football fan would skip out on the excitement of the Spring Game. You're staying home to watch the NFL Draft, so that you can see what pick Newman is or who drafts Terry Pierce and Tank Reese, right?

Wayside football fan experiences little interest in hype surrounding game

Spring Game is tomorrow, or so I hear.

You see, the only reason I knew about the game is because I'm the Collegian's editor in chief. I was told there'd be a section for this shindig. Then I had to make sure Dan, the sports editor, put it together. Then I had to look at it before it was printed and make sure it actually looked OK.

That's about as close to the Spring Game as I'll ever come.

Don't get me wrong. I love K-State football. I've had season tickets every year I've been here. I may be too short for you all to see, but I'm always there in the stands, key-shakin' and Wabashin' with the best of them.

Maybe I just love football for the wrong reasons.

First of all, what else is there for a young Cat to do on a fine fall day? At the season's dawn, it's still warm enough to feel the sun on your shoulders as you chant in the stands with all the other shouting students. Even the wet, nose-dripping, goose-bumpy games bring a certain solidarity for those who cared enough to come.

The barbecues and parking lot parties don't hurt. Of course, my guy friends and I bring lots of Odoul's so we can get down with our bad, non-alcoholic selves. Stadium rules, kids.

But that stuff doesn't happen at Spring Game, does it? At least I would think not. And there have to be less people there. No friends' parents to bring home-baked cookies and potato salad. No little kids pretending they know how to toss those fake, Nerf-y pigskins around (OK, I really don't either).

The most important missing aspect of Spring Game is — drumroll, please — the other team.

That means no skits or laughing at opponents' goofy mascots — OSU, that means you. I don't know how that dude doesn't topple over with that massive hat. I wish he would.

It's just hard to believe the Wildcats are truly willing to wait on each other. I like to see crumpled bodies, crashing helmets and severed limbs strewn by the sidelines.

According to my expert assessment, if no one gets hurt, the boys probably didn't give 120 percent, as they should.

I want to see hardcore action on the field, men. And switching jerseys probably ain't gonna bring it on.

The word "scrimmage" does not pump up my adrenaline level enough. They should just call tomorrow's game "Spring Practice that People are Allowed to Watch, and Have to Pay For."

Tomorrow afternoon during game time, while my colleague Chris Shank is watching to see who will replace Terence Newman, I'll be checking out the tight ends.

If I'm at the game, that is. If not, you'll either catch me on the couch, in the park or simply on the flip side, wherever the hell that is.

I'll be there next fall, when carnage and competition have the Willie-approved guarantee.

Receiver improving with experience

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If history proves true, James Terry should have an All-American-type season this fall. In 1998 and 2000 respectively, Darnell McDonald and Quincy Morgan followed up stellar junior seasons with All-American seasons as seniors.

The three of them share one thing in common — they were all junior college recruits.

Co-offensive coordinator and wide receivers coach Greg Peterson said an adjustment period is normal for a player coming from a junior college.

"It takes some time," he said. "When Darnell McDonald came, his first year as a full-time player, I think he had 30 to 35 catches. His coming-out game was in the Fiesta Bowl against Syracuse, where he had big catches and the big yardage. Then, his senior year, he catches 75 balls."

"Quincy Morgan comes in and redshirted his first year, so he had an extra year of preparation," Peterson said. "Then, in his junior year, he had 40 catches and over 1,000 yards, but his senior year is really when he emerged. He had 65 to 70 catches and certainly was one of the dominant players in the league."

Peterson said Terry has yet to show the same types of traits as those two, but he said he expects him to do so by the time the Cats kickoff the 2003 season in August.

"James Terry is certainly our most experienced and our most seasoned player outside," he said. "But I think he is still learning as well."

Terry is the only returning starter and is the only receiver who caught more than 15 passes last season, with 28. Peterson said Terry has the big-play ability but that the junior needs to step up in more of a leadership role.

"We're fairly inexperienced collectively as a group," Peterson said. "So I think until somebody really establishes themselves as a big-time playmaker, a guy that's a go-to guy, we're going to feel our way a little bit."

Wide receiver James Terry dives toward the end zone scoring the first touchdown against Louisiana-Monroe. Terry had two catches for 37 yards and one touchdown. Terry will be counted on for leadership this fall on a young Wildcat receiving corps.

Taco Wallace, last year's leading receiver, is gone, but players like Derrick Evans, Davin Dennis and junior college transfers Tony Madison and John Cooper are returning.

Madison redshirted last season, much like Morgan did after transferring to K-State. Cooper, a senior, did not appear in a game last season but has all the tools to be an impact receiver in the Big 12, Peterson said.

"John Cooper has been catching the ball very well this spring," Peterson said. "He's still learning our system and trying to be assignment-sound. I think that limits any of us as far as going out and playing at full speed. Certainly the summer will be beneficial for him as well. Having fall camp, he'll feel like a veteran player by then."

"Tony Madison has been a little inconsistent," he said.

"He has loads of potential, but he's not where he can be or will be. But I'm not disappointed in him by any means."

The guy throwing to the receivers this year, Ell Roberson, said he has been impressed with the group's process this year, especially Evans.

"Our receivers are coming along," he said. "Derrick is really trying to step up and take a leadership position at the wide receiver spot and knows what he has to do. He's going out there and working hard and trying to get the receivers better."

"Derrick Evans has really stepped up and taken on a leadership role from the receiver spot," Roberson said. "He's really starting to pick it up and understand blitzes and where he's supposed to be. In order for us to be successful, he needs to understand that spot because it's a key spot for us."

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When junior linebacker Terry Pierce declared himself eligible for Saturday's NFL Draft, K-State knew he was going to be missed.

How much and who would step into the large shoes he left behind are questions still lingering as the Cats prepare for Saturday's Spring Game.

Among the candidates are sophomores Matt Butler and Ted Sims. Butler enters the Spring Game No. 1 on the depth chart with Sims as his backup.

Coach Bill Snyder said both players have been making progress this spring.

"Matt Butler has done a nice job, I've been pleased with him," Snyder said. "Ted Sims has made some strides of late here in the spring in a variety of different areas that I'm pleased with. I'm not uncomfortable about the transition."

Returning at linebacker are seniors Bryan Hickman and Josh Buhl. Hickman ranked fourth on the team in total tackles with 79 while Buhl led the squad with 135.

Buhl said that losing Pierce is tough, someone is going to have to fill the void.

"He's definitely going to be missed," Buhl said. "It's going to be different with him not out there as far as the chemistry of our defense and what we're accustomed to from him last year."

Butler said while it's hard to replace an NFL-caliber player, "It's always hard following in the footsteps of a great linebacker," he said. "The other linebackers have helped out a lot."

K-State linebacker Bryan Hickman runs away from Oklahoma State's Rashaun Woods during the Cat's 44-9 win last October at KSU Stadium. Hickman and Josh Buhl return to anchor this year's linebacking corps.

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said Butler has been making the improvements necessary to win a starting job.

"Butler has really raised the level of his play, both from a mental standpoint where he's really taken charge and made calls," Elliott said. "Our middle linebacker is the quarterback of the defense."

"We know he's good enough to do it — he's big and fast and he has the right mentality. We're happy with him — we think he's really come on. I don't see any reason why he can't play like the middle linebackers that played here."

While they have a tough task in living up to the standards set by last year's linebacking corps, Elliott said this year's group has plenty of potential.

"They're going to be good," Elliott said. "Whether it's Matt Butler or anybody else, our threesome today would not be as good as last fall, but our threesome last spring wasn't as good as it was in the fall, either. We have expectations of whoever plays middle linebacker that they're going to be a Kansas State middle linebacker and play at that level. And somehow, some way, Bret (Bielema, co-defensive coordinator and linebackers coach) will get that out of them."

If Butler and Sims want to prove themselves, the Spring Game is the time to do it, Elliott said.

"A lot of guys are really looking to prove something on Saturday," Buhl said. "Our guys are trying to get spots and show they can play within our offense and defense. That's what the Spring Game is for."

Competition still important factor in backfield

K-State running back Danny Morris runs the ball at KSU Stadium last season. Morris will finish spring drills behind Darren Sproles on the depth chart, but he figures to get plenty of action this fall.

No. 2 backup spot must keep competitive mindset, focus on improving game every day

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When you're stuck behind one of the best quarterbacks or running backs in college football, it can be tough to get respect.

That's what backup quarterbacks Jeff Schwinn and Dylan Meir, and running back Danny Morris are looking to do Saturday, though. The trio is sitting behind quarterback Ell Roberson and running back Darren Sproles.

Schwinn, a senior from McClouth, Kan., finds himself second on the depth chart this spring, the closest he's been to the starting job since arriving in Manhattan in 1999.

"Right now, I'm number two," he said.

"I treat it as you never know what's going to happen. I go out there everyday and try and push and try to be the number-one quarterback. I think that's the way you've got to take it and the mindset you have to have to proceed.

"It has been a long road," he said. "It's an uphill battle.

You've got to go into it with the mindset that you've got to push to be the number-one guy. That's what I've been trying to do since I got here. If you don't, as a competitor, you're in the wrong sport."

A fifth-year senior, Schwinn said he hopes to be a leader, especially to ease Meir, a redshirt freshman, into the offense.

"Balanced, but yet, being a leader is what I pride myself on," he said.

"Dylan's fine, and he's learning," Schwinn said. "Just like everyone else that comes into this program, it takes a lot to learn this stuff. Each day he's getting better, and he's going to be all right."

Meir is the brother of former Wildcat tight end Shad Meir. The younger Meir arrived in Manhattan last fall as a raw quarterback that most recruiting services touted as an athlete rather than a quarterback.

"I've always thought of myself as a quarterback and a quarterback only," he said. "I hope I'm considered an athlete saying that I play football. I hope all football players are athletes.

"I think of myself as an athlete that plays quarterback," Meir said, "and a quarterback that's an athlete. Based upon what everybody says, I do my thing, I do what the coaches tell me, and I try to improve."

Roberson said competition is always nice to have, and Schwinn and Meir have given him exactly that.

"Schwinn is a great quarterback," he said.

"He's a lot like me. He likes to run, and he has a great arm. He's a lot more accurate than I am. He's a great quarterback. It will be tough for me. He's going to keep me busy, and I've been on my back the whole time. It's been good.

"They're doing pretty well," Roberson said. "We've got some young guys in there that are trying to learn. For the most part, for the time we've been practicing, they've done a pretty good job. They've still got a lot to learn."

The learning curve won't be as steep for the backup running backs. Following Sproles are names like Morris, Daniel Davis, Carlos Alsup and Ayo Saba.

Morris is second on the depth chart and said the depth at the position is often what makes a team stronger.

"That's kind of the core of an offense," Morris said. "If you have a strong tailback, that kind of works with your passing game, because you can run and nobody can just stack up on the pass.

"I think we're as deep as we always have been," he said.

"I think we've got a lot of talent there. Of course everybody knows Sproles. But everyone else is making good progress.

Morris said every running back has improved this spring.

"All of them really caught my eye, he said. "I've been watching practice, and all of them have vastly improved from last year, even Sproles.

"Everybody knows their roles," Morris said. "If you're not the starter, you're always one play away. You've got to play your role, go at it and keep getting better as the days go on."

K-State looks to add another game to official schedule

Team negotiating final stages of contract, may lock down 13th game

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The official schedule doesn't note it, but K-State is close to locking down a 13th game for the 2003 season.

Coach Bill Snyder said the team is in the final stage of negotiating a contract with the Black Coaches Association for a game in Kansas City, Mo., on August 23.

"They're in contracts right now, so as soon as we get a finalized contract worked out and whatever sticking points there are, supposedly that will do it," Snyder said.

In order to play the game, K-State already had to jump through some hoops.

They received a waiver from the NCAA as teams are typically only allowed to participate in one preseason game every four years.

K-State used that privilege against Iowa in the 2000 Eddie Robinson Classic.

If the BCA game is finalized, the Cats will face California.

The Golden Bears were last seen in Big 12 country ripping Baylor 70-22.

The score was enough to catch Snyder's attention.

"I just looked at their first ballgame last year when they scored 73 points against Baylor and we were struggling to get 30," he said. "That tells me that that's a concern, that they have an offense that's productive."

While Snyder may be wary of the Bear offense, his players are eager for another opportunity to shine.

The game would be played at night at Arrowhead Stadium and would likely be nationally televised.

An early game to catch the nation's attention is just the kind of exposure the Wildcats want.

"It's early, and it will be the first game," linebacker Josh Buhl said. "That's always nice to have — some good coverage right at the beginning of the season."

An additional game against a top-tier opponent also could be good news for K-State.

The Cats have two Division I-AA teams on the schedule, a matter that could prove important as the Bowl Championship Series rankings are worked out at the end of the season.

For some though, the prestige of the game would be the main attraction.

Ell Roberson couldn't restrain his feelings about playing on the big field under the lights.

"I am so excited about it because I don't get to play at night that much anymore," he said. "In high school, I always played at night. So night games are kind of fun for me. It just gets me up a whole lot."

The 13th game could make for a marathon season, though.

If the Cats qualify for the Big 12 Championship and for their 11th consecutive post-season bowl, they would play 15 times.

Roberson wasn't worried, though. As long as Snyder eases a little during practice, he'd love the opportunity.

"It will be a long season, but Coach Snyder, he puts us in a position to win, and I don't think he will do anything to jeopardize our team when it takes the field.

"I love to play football. 15 games — I'd love to play 15 games — but I don't want to go through the beating of all those practices."

Wildcats replace offensive coordinator with 2 new coaches

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Change isn't on the minds of the coaches and players of an offense that averaged 44.8 points a game in 2002.

Instead of replacing Hudson with one coach, however, Coach Bill Snyder decided to bring in two familiar faces in Hudson's place.

Del Miller, who served as assistant head coach and offensive coordinator for Snyder from 1989-94, and Greg Peterson, entering his 10th season as an assistant coach at K-State, will call the plays for the Wildcats in 2003.

Snyder said there shouldn't be too many adjustments made as a result of the new coaching staff.

"I don't think any at all really," he said. "For a player like Eli (Roberson) being around coach Hudson for a long period of time, there's a transition. For me there's no transition because Del was in our program for a long time in the same capacity. Greg has basically done what his title now is indicating."

"The only thing is players getting used to coaches and vice versa," Snyder said. "Del is very user-friendly as it relates to the players, so they've developed a good relationship."

Miller was on the opposite side of the ball for the Cats last year, coaching defensive ends. His focus now will switch to offense, especially the quarterbacks.

"It's kind of like all the previous years other than last year," Miller said. "I've really enjoyed it. It's what my passion is. I enjoy working with all the quarterbacks and all of the offensive positions because that's where the vast majority of my experience has been."

Peterson has served as the wide receivers coach since 1997 and will continue his focus on that as he becomes the co-offensive coordinator.

"I'm probably a little bit more involved with the play-calling situation and working hands-on," he said. "With the previous staff, we were all very active. I think one thing we've done as an offense collectively this spring, is that we've spent more time going back to the basics as far as everybody being on the same page with the schemes and assignments."

"Everybody having a good feel for what all 11 players are doing on the field at one time," Peterson said. "From that standpoint, maybe it's where our focus has been."

One thing absent from K-State's offense in the past few seasons has been a pass-catching running back. Last year, Wildcat backs had only 13 catches.

"We'd always like to do that," Miller said. "You're always trying to get the ball in the guy's hands that can make plays. Certainly Darren Sproles is one of those guys. We've mentioned a couple other guys there that are talented, and you'd like to get the ball in their hands."

Senior Danny Morris said he is looking forward to finding more ways to get the ball to the runningbacks.

"As a running back, you hope so," he said. "But you can only hope. You don't really know what's going through people's heads. As a running back, you always want to touch the ball any way you can."

Quarterback Eli Roberson might need the biggest adjustment period to a new quarterback coach, but even the Cats' quarterback said he has been pleased with the changes so far.

"What coach Pete and coach Miller are trying to do this year is utilize our talent to the best of our ability as far as putting us in schemes that will make us succeed," Roberson said. "Last year and the year before, we had a lot of schemes but a lot of the guys weren't focused and didn't know what to do, and they were trying to make everything easier for the younger guys to pick it up."

"It's kind of hard for me because I've been here for a couple years, and I have to change my style. They aren't making drastic changes, but it's changes that will help us."

DUO | Sproles, Roberson both experience improvement since 2002 season in 2003.

"We've been running it for so long now that (Darren) really has a feel for me, and I really have a feel for him," he said. "If I can't find an open receiver, I'll come down to him and he's going to try his best to be open. That's something we worked on last year, and it's really working for us this spring."

Offseason improvement hasn't been limited to the duo's communication skills, though. Coaches said both Roberson and Sproles will return as better players.

Sproles, who rushed for 1,465 yards last year, has increased his lifting capacity nearly 10 percent, Snyder said.

"Darren is a better player now than when he finished the season," Snyder said. "He seems a little bit quicker — maybe he isn't. He seems a little bit more elusive — maybe he isn't. He seems a little bit more powerful. He seems a little bit better at everything that he does."

Defensive coordinator Bob Elliott, whose squad will face Roberson and Sproles on Saturday, is plenty scared of just Roberson, though.

He alone can be enough to give opponents nightmares, Elliott said. Anyone who can gain yards in so many different ways is a very dangerous player.

"As a defensive coach trying to prepare for Eli Roberson, he gives you every problem known to man," he said.

"You have option problems. You have quarterback run problems. You've got scramble problems, and he's a good thrower."

Last season, Roberson took a giant leap in his passing game. He threw for more than 700 more yards and increased his passing efficiency by 46.5 points.

"That's the thing people are missing on," Elliott said.

"He's really a good thrower and will be this year. Even though he was a little off, he's gotten more consistent. He's got all that, and now he's got some savvy and some experience. That guy is hard to stop."

While both Roberson and Sproles are formidable players on their own, Miller said their strength is in each other and the multitude of ways they can move the ball.

It is an arsenal Miller is happy to have on his side.

"Obviously, the more weapons you have, the more a defense has to prepare and the more difficult it is. Eli's the kind of guy you like to have the ball in his hands, and you like to have the ball in Darren's hands. Anytime you're just one dimensional, it's just so much easier to take things away from a defensive standpoint."

"With those two, we aren't one dimensional."

Junior college recruits to strengthen secondary

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At first, they don't look too intimidating.

The two junior college cornerbacks brought in to strengthen the Wildcat secondary appear as if they could stand atop one another and still look up to tight end Thomas Hill.

Their combined weight likely wouldn't even register opposite one of K-State's giant offensive linemen.

Cedrick Williams, officially the smaller of the two, said he's proud of what he's achieved and expects nothing less than becoming the next star corner back at K-State.

After his first Division 1 scrimmage, he claimed the biggest difference was in the size of the running backs. He discovered this the hard way, running head-long into a charging Carlos Alsup. The result: a minor concussion and a lesson learned.

"I didn't come out and was seeing stars," he said. "Most players would have come out."

"They threw a fade route touchdown to James Terry, and I was kind of mad because it was the first one I gave up in two years. But I just showed them if I got hurt in a game, I could play through it, and I didn't complain about it."

Corey Reddick is five pounds heavier.

The heated competition for the starting spot doesn't have him bent out of shape.

"I get along with everybody," Reddick said. "Just because we're competing doesn't mean that we're enemies. We all help each other, but the best one will get the spot regardless. We don't go out there and fight amongst each other. We go out there and help each other and lift each other up."

At first glance, neither Williams nor Reddick, both 5-foot-9, first appear big enough to fill the hole left by consensus All-American Terence Newman.

But both plan to impress fans at Saturday's Spring Game.

"I can't wait to get out there in front of them," Reddick said. "I don't even know how many people there will be, but just to hear the fans — it makes chills go through your body."

Even if the duo fails to raise eyebrows on Saturday, they said it is still early in the learning process and there is a long way to go.

After making the jump from junior college, Williams said there is a learning curve that takes some adapting to. The lack of consistency doesn't have to do with his talent, he said — that will show through in a matter of time.

"The biggest stride is learning the system. It wouldn't be talent-wise," Williams said. "I have enough talent and the athleticism to play at this level. I'm just adjusting to the different terminology of the game."

The race for the corner back position involves more than just the two new junior college transfers, though. A pair of corner backs from last year's junior college class is also hunting for the starting position opposite Randy Jordan.

David Rose and Louis Lavender, both juniors from California, will keep the competition interesting, defensive coordinator Bobby Elliott said.

Last year, the Wildcat secondary was shallow all season, but, he said, the new crop of competitors has added a lot of depth.

"We're better than we were a year ago," Elliott said. "When I say depth, though, I don't want it to be mistaken for performance. Depth is what happens when you have to put six defensive backs on the field to stop the passing game."

"I feel the addition of Cedrick and Corey gives us more cover guys. The emergence of Lavender and the improvement of Rose have given us decent cover guys."

Special teams area of concern for Cats this spring

Snyder says kicking team has made noticeable progress since last season

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If there was a thorn in the side of every K-State fan last fall, it would have been the play of the Wildcat kicking unit.

Last season's kicking tandem of Joe Rheem and Jared Brite was a combined 65-for-74 on point-after-attempts and a combined 68.8 percent on field goal attempts.

Coach Bill Snyder said the kicking game has made some definite improvements during spring drills.

"Probably the greatest amount of improvement has been made in the field goal units, and I think we're protecting with greater effectiveness," Snyder said.

"I think we're hitting the ball as well as we did towards the end of the year, probably better."

Rheem enters the spring as the No. 1 kicker on the depth chart, handling both kickoff and field goal duties.

He said the unit is making progress.

"I think we have been doing a lot better," Rheem said. "It's just a matter of time. I'm hitting the ball real well."

Another concern with the kicking game is Rheem's range. His longest field goal last year was a 39-yarder, something he said he has improved on since last season.

"In a live scrimmage, I had a 58 and a 54," Rheem said. "I could go a little deeper than that, hopefully."

While range is a concern,

Jesse Tetuan holds the ball while Jared Brite kicks off during the Oklahoma State game last season. Brite will compete for a spot on K-State's kicking team this fall.

consistency is the team's top goal this spring, Snyder said.

"The things that we have to work out are very do-able," Snyder said.

"I think we're all right there. Joe has hit some tremendous kicks. As with all kickers, the only thing you have to worry about is consistency. If they're capable, then consistency is the key word."

Snyder emphasized that if the kicking game is going to succeed, the whole unit is going to be involved, not just the kicker.

"I look at the entirety of it," he said. "How good are our 11 people out there?"

Another concern in the special teams unit is replacing Terence Newman, the team's leading return man last season. Snyder said he has plenty of options to explore, including the use of junior Darren Sproles, the team's leading rusher last season.

"There are a large number of options," Snyder said.

"Derrick Evans has done a nice job with returns. Maurice Mack - we've just recently tried to give him some opportunities back there and he has proven to me that he's very capable of doing so."

"Davin Dennis has worked back there, James Terry has worked back there. This is all on punt returns, and we've got a plethora of people that are involved with our kickoff returns, Darren included."

One question concerning Sproles' duties as a return man is his durability, something Snyder said isn't a factor in his decision.

"If you go back to this time last year - or maybe as we initiated the season last year - and there was always the feeling of 'How durable is this young guy?'" Snyder said.

"I can remember making a point of it - Darren Sproles has not proven to me that he is anything less than as durable as any player that we have on the football field."

"I think he proved last year and I don't see it any differently today than I did then."

Halftime ceremony to honor soldiers serving overseas

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bill Snyder has spent his entire career coaching young men to play with honor, courage and dignity.

But on Saturday, as 102 such players take time for a rest during the annual Spring Game, K-State will take time to honor other young men fighting a much more important battle.

"This is a major thing in our lives that's taking place here in the past couple of months, and there are a lot of people that need not go unrecognized," Snyder said.

At halftime, there will be a ceremony recognizing those serving in Iraq as well as their loved ones back home. It is set to include military families from Fort Riley as well as the family of Sgt. Jacob Lee Butler of Wellsville, Kan., a soldier killed in Iraq.

"I hope it's appropriate," Snyder said.

"This is just a small thing in the terms of what it's all about. There are a lot of special people there."

Snyder said the university tried to arrange for Kansas native and former prisoner of war Patrick Miller to be on hand, but something a little more important kept that from happening.

"The Miller family, including Patrick, who I understand is a great K-State fan, really wanted to be here," he said.

"But they're going to be in Washington, D.C., in an audience with the President, so we can appreciate that a great deal."

While they missed this time, an effort will be made to line up another ceremony for Miller and his family during the fall football season.

"We will and I want to," Snyder said.

"My heart goes out to him and his family, but there are a lot of others who served and put their lives at risk the same way, and many have lost their lives, and the families have to suffer through that. They're all extremely important to us."

Snyder said he responded to the news coverage of the war similar to millions of Americans. He was glued to the TV set.

He said hearing the stories told by the young soldiers, the same age as the ones he coaches every day, really had an effect.

"Watching all of the reporting that went on, all the embedded concept, and I tell you what, you get a chance to listen to those young guys about the same age as the ones we have, and it's pretty doggone impressive," Snyder said.

"It just brings more clear to my mind what our armed services do and how they train young people, and it also sends a message."

In the past, Snyder has expressed concern for the modern youth society.

But he said watching America's soldiers in action has reaffirmed his feelings about the generation.

Listening to what they conveyed is very important, he said.

"I'll tell you what, if you watched the same stuff I watched, these are classy kids. I really appreciate it, and you learn the real value of discipline after you spend some time listening to those guys."

We've got the stories you've got to read.

Elizabeth Altenbernd, junior in hotel and restaurant management, chants during the Take Back the Night march from the K-State Student Union Plaza to City Park on Friday night. The female-only march promoted the ideas that women should not have to be afraid to walk alone at night and that violence against women needs to stop.

'Angry' women march against sexual violence

KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

It was easy to get the impression that a lot of women were angry Friday night.

With chants, bullhorns and signs, the annual Take Back the Night March, led by Ordinary Women, took a loud course from the K-State Student Union Plaza to City Park. And as the rally began, Liz Crain, executive director of surgical services at the Overland Park Planned Parenthood Clinic, said in her speech that women have reason to be angry.

"I agree we're angry," she said. "We're angry that they are not. Where is the outrage and anger against the men and boys who perpetuate these acts of violence?"

The march takes place each year to give women a voice in speaking out against abuse and rape while supporting feminine strength.

American forces will not leave Iraq

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

ABU DHABI, United Arab Emirates — The United States wants to keep using military bases in friendly Persian Gulf countries, including a high-tech command center in Qatar where planners directed the war in Iraq, U.S. officials said Sunday.

Gen. Tommy Franks, the top war commander, and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld met with officials in the United Arab Emirates on the first stop of a tour of the region. After talks with the UAE's defense minister and chief of staff, Rumsfeld and Franks said American military forces were not going to leave any time soon.

"We assured them that the United States intends to do what is necessary to make sure there is a secure environment in Iraq," Rumsfeld said.

"There's no question but that the people of this region are safer today than they were when the Saddam Hussein regime was in power."

Rumsfeld is in the region to meet with U.S. troops involved in the war in Iraq and to discuss America's role after overthrowing Saddam. Rumsfeld also plans to visit Afghanistan this week to see government leaders and U.S. troops.

The defense secretary has said the United States is considering reducing or rearranging its presence in the Persian Gulf region now that the threat from Iraq is over.

But Franks said a possible reduction in the American use of ports and air bases in the UAE did not come up Sunday. He said the issues needs more study.

Franks said the U.S. military presence in the region might increase, at least in the short term, as stability and humanitarian relief missions in Iraq and Afghanistan continue.

The United States also wants to keep using the Qatar command center built just before the war and used by Franks as his headquarters for the Iraq campaign.

Charity game begins tradition

By Mako Shores
KANSAS STATE COLLEGLIAN

A new K-State tradition has been started, and the women of K-State and football players are all a part of it.

KSDB-FM 91.9 sponsored Big Steve's Spring Powder Puff game on Sunday afternoon at Memorial Stadium to raise money for the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan, Wildcat 91.9 and to establish a student-athlete scholarship fund. Organizers took donations walking through the stands and sold raffle tickets. Winners won footballs signed by K-State football players.

Female students came out to play two hours of a flag football game, coached by current and former K-State football players.

"It was a lot of fun," said Steve Washington, senior in criminal justice and creator/co-organizer of the event. "I wanted to put on the game to show the unity of the K-State football team and at the same time show that the team is interested in doing community work."

NAMES IN THE NEWS

Jolie's new mark to keep bad luck away

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Angelina Jolie has a new tattoo.
The black tattoo on her back consists of five vertical rows of ancient Cambodian script, designed to ward off bad luck, the Nation newspaper reported Thursday.

"I like it a lot. It looks very sacred. I think I'll have a new tattoo the next time I come to Thailand," the 27-year-old actress was quoted as saying.

It was applied Wednesday by well-known tattoo artist Noo Kamphai in Pathum Thani, 16 miles north of Bangkok, the newspaper said.

Jolie is reported to have many tattoos, most notably a dragon on her upper left arm. Above that is etched "Billy Bob," the name of her estranged husband, Billy Bob Thornton.

When she attended the British Academy of Film and Television Arts awards in London earlier this year, "Billy Bob" wasn't visible, apparently covered by makeup.

Jolie, a goodwill ambassador for the United Nations refugee agency, became enchanted with Cambodia in 2000 while filming "Lara Croft: Tomb Raider." She later adopted an infant from Cambodia.

Her upcoming films include "Lara Croft Tomb Raider: The Cradle of Life," "Sharkslayer" and "The World of Tomorrow."

Congress to honor Robinson

Jackie Robinson, who broke baseball's color barrier in 1947, will be honored posthumously with Congress' highest honor, a Congressional Gold Medal, the Los Angeles Dodgers announced.

The honor, recognizing the Hall of Famer's contributions to equality and civil rights, is "well-deserved and long overdue," said Bob Graziano, the Dodgers' president and chief operating officer.

"He is such an important part of our franchise's history, our pastime's history and our nation's history," Graziano said Friday in a statement. "Jackie was an extraordinary talent and pioneer and will forever be one of America's treasured symbols."

Robinson's daughter, Sharon, will accept the award Wednesday in Washington. Her father, who died in 1972, played 10 seasons in the major leagues, all with the Dodgers.

Taylor reflects on younger days at dedication

James Taylor didn't have a guitar or even a microphone when he sang during the weekend, and he was backed up by Gov. Mike Easley and the Chapel Hill High School band.

The song was "The Star-Spangled Banner," and the occasion was a ceremony to unveil a sign naming a bridge in his honor.

The "James Taylor Bridge" sign will soon be posted where U.S. 15-501 South crosses Morgan Creek. The award-winning singer and songwriter spent much of his childhood in Chapel Hill in a home near the creek, and the memories inspired his hit song "Copperline."

Taylor told the crowd of hundreds he felt strongly connected to the area, and he remembered waiting for the school bus and seeing a group of inmates chained together as they worked on the highway, while a truckload of chickens passed by.

"It was a different time," he said Saturday. "Things have gotten a lot better in many ways. Things have gotten more complicated, too."

Di's memoirs for sale

Eight letters and a Christmas card from Princess Diana will go on the auction block this week along with 300 other items from the estate of fashion editor Liz Tilberis.

Tilberis, who died of ovarian cancer in 1999 at age 51, often hobnobbed with celebrities like Diana through her work as editor of British Vogue and Harper's Bazaar.

The letters were expected to fetch about $32,000 altogether at the auction Wednesday at the Cyr Auction Gallery in his southern Maine town.

Other auction items include four Versace tops made for Tilberis with personalized labels, a sketch of Tilberis by designer Karl Lagerfeld, and a full set of Versace china. Some proceeds were earmarked for the Ovarian Cancer Research Fund.

Former Enron worker speaks out

What the corporate world needs, according to Enron whistleblower Sherron Watkins, is a few good women.

"Women can ask questions and not feel it's an insult, challenge or sign of distrust of the CEO. They're just asking because they want to know," she said Saturday at the Simmons School of Management women's leadership conference.

"I think many of us don't look at personal consequences. There's more the feeling of wanting what is good for all of us."

Watkins, a former Enron accountant who warned then-company CEO Kenneth Lay of impending disaster before the company collapsed, said in an interview that women have qualities that the corporate world lacks.

Engineering teams compete in concrete canoe races

K-State wins awards despite seeing boat sink

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The K-State Concrete Canoe Racing team found that duct tape can fix a cracked canoe – at least for a little while.

K-State hosted and competed in the concrete canoe races as part of the American Society of Civil Engineers' 2003 Mid-Continental Student Conference Saturday at Tuttle Creek State Park's Riverpond Area.

K-State's canoe had a small crack to begin with, which team members tried to fix with plastic and duct tape. By the time the last race came around, however, the canoe was nothing but chunks of cement. The team did not place overall.

Although 13 schools attended the conference, only eight competed in the canoe races, said Mike Stein, graduate student in civil engineering.

The canoes are not made of common cement.

"They are made of glass beads, sand and Styrofoam," he said.

The mixture must be at least 75 percent Portland cement – a special cement made of clay and limestone – and can be shaped with chicken wire or carbon fiber mesh, according to the ASCE Web site.

The conference, which began Thursday, included other competitions including steel bridge building, bridge building using K'nex, concrete bowling and a catapult building competition.

The canoe competition was judged on many different aspects, including the actual race, an oral presentation of the canoe, a technical report and the final product, judge Duane Gish said.

"There are a wide range of things the teams have to practice and be skilled in," he said.

The point is for everyone to get a chance to race, Gish said.

"Everybody comes to race as much as they can, and they get to," he said.

Male, female and co-ed races were held in distance and sprints, judge Ryan McKaskle said.

The distance race is 600 meters, with a 100 meter slalom in which the canoe has to negotiate seven buoys, he said. The sprint is 100 meters to the buoy and 100 meters back.

The last race of the day – a faculty race – wasn't for competition.

"The faculty race is just for fun," Gish said. "It's always a ton of fun to get the professors involved."

Bob Thorn, member of the board of direction for ASCE, said K-State has been competing in the canoe races since 1965.

About 15 years ago, Master Builders started hosting the national competition, he said. The winners from Saturday's competition will go to the national competition, which awards scholarships to its winners, he said.

Drew Rose | COLLEGIAN

Chad Grisiér, senior in civil engineering, and Marshall Bird, freshman in civil engineering, struggle as their canoe begins to sink during the concrete canoe races Saturday morning at Tuttle Creek River Pond Area. The races were a part of the American Society of Civil Engineers Mid-Continent student conference at K-State last week.

Although the concrete canoe races didn't begin until 1965, the ASCE competition has been going on since 1942, Alok Bhandari, assistant professor of civil engineering, said.

Teams must be certified by the American Board of Engineering and Technology. The team also must have a faculty adviser and a practitioner adviser. To race the canoe, the students must assist in construction, he said.

The project is very time consuming, Bhandari said.

"They design it in their free time," he said. "They are in charge of all fund raising and designing. They make different concrete mixes and look at strength, then define a design, pour the concrete and mold it. They will begin work for next year pretty soon."

Closing ceremonies were at Tuttle Creek, with awards given in individual races, as well as overall. K-State won two special awards – Spirit of Competition and Spirit of Conference.

TO THE POINT Forces should present clear plan for Iraq

Now that the war in Iraq is over, the United States and coalition forces have an obligation to rebuild and repair Iraqi government and society, and then come back home.

Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and Gen. Tommy Franks met with United Arab Emirates on Sunday, saying the United States would maintain its bases in the Persian Gulf indefinitely. This is the right decision by the U.S. military in order to fulfill its responsibility to repair the damage created by the war and ensure the instability in the region does not create further conflict.

However, once a stable government is established in Iraq and agreements are reached with neighboring nations, U.S. forces must leave immediately.

A timetable must be drawn to ensure forces are held accountable for their actions and the speed with which they restore peace in the region.

By having an indefinite timetable, the generals are showing no signs of stopping their control over the country. Reassurance must be given to the already suspicious governments in the region, so that they may aid in the rebuilding and cooperate with U.S. forces.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Misconceptions of racism prevent social progress on issue

People are people. Enough said, right? Wrong.

When I was young, that was a phrase that I heard from many of my grade school teachers' mouths. It wasn't right to treat people differently, because we were all people and thus deserved the same treatment. Of course as a youngster, there is no way you can go against your teacher and win, so I kept my mouth shut. But even then, I knew I wasn't getting the whole story – and I'm still not.

Twenty-some-odd years later, and I'm still not getting the whole story?

In today's society, we do not treat all people the same. The way we treat people is according to what we think we know. That person is wearing a hijab – he must be a Muslim (which currently equals terrorist). That person has cornrows and braids – she must be a thug or hoodlum. That person has a pager, cell phone, and a two-way he must be a drug dealer.

Sure, this stuff may sound idiotic, but it happens. Racism is rooted in the idiocy that is truth to the idiot. Sound crazy?

First example: "Angel, when I look at you, I don't see color. I just see you." Wow, that's great and everything, but unless you're color-blind, it's really hard not to notice that I am a black female. When people say things like that, they don't realize that in their feeble attempt to be politically correct, they are robbing me of an important part of my identity. Even if that is not what you meant by the statement, you are still fooling yourself by not acknowledging my race (especially since it is something that is so obvious).

Second example: "I'm not racist. I have black friends." Really? Me too! I also have a color TV! This one should be fairly obvious. If something doesn't apply to you, why bother viciously defending yourself? That is like trying to explain that you do not like someone. When you start defending yourself to friends, it appears that you like that person even more.

Third example: "What do you mean white privilege? I've never benefited from it." Well, according to historical trends, you have. This statement is always particularly funny to me because on one hand, you want to be considered an individual (YOU haven't benefited from white privilege), but then you also want to share in the overall success of the white middle class. White privilege is looked at on an overall scale. And on this historical scale, whites have been the contented recipients of it. If you happen to be an outlier, so be it. In case you did not know, outliers do not get much consideration.

Fourth example: "It's the minorities that make race a big deal." Oh really? What's the common denominator in these sentences: A room full of noisy black girls. Who's the black Multicultural Assistant in Goodnow Hall? I was talking to the short, Asian dude with the glasses.

In case you didn't guess correctly, it's race.

Not one of these sentences needed to disclose the person's race. Why couldn't the girls just be noisy? Why couldn't it just be that the room next door was noisy? If every hall has only one MA, why does it have to be specified that Goodnow has a black one? Why can't the description of the guy you were talking to be left at short with glasses? It is not the people of color who keep bringing race into the equation. In most cases, it was already involved.

It is a shame that even with the advances that have been made in this great world of ours, we continue to blame those people who do not have the power to change anything yet. Until we understand that racism is not about being oversensitive, but about being aware of each other and ourselves, we will keep progressing at a snail's pace. All of us.

RACIAL RHETORIC

Racial perceptions confuse statements as discrimination

Racism is a very sensitive topic in today's society. With issues such as the flying of the Confederate flag in southern states or the troubles with racial stereotyping, it is easy to see why emotions run so strong.

I define racism as discrimination, judgment or prejudice based on race. The American Heritage College dictionary says something similar.

"Racism n. 1. The belief that race accounts for differences in human character or ability and that a particular race is superior to others.

2. Discrimination or prejudice based on race."

Granted, racism does occur and is something of a problem, but sometimes I think people view things that are not race issues as racist acts. People may have an experience with a racist individual and then begin to take offense at things they may once have viewed as completely rational neutral comments.

I know of several situations in the residence halls when a black person will take something such as being asked to quiet down a bit as someone being racist. The girl will have been being noisy, screaming and shouting in the hall or playing her music too loud. Her neighbor may be trying to study or take a nap or even just want some peace and quiet and will kindly ask the noisy person to turn down her music or possibly not scream and shout.

In many cases, when the person asked to quiet down is black, she takes offense and the ignition phrase, "it's because I'm black," is uttered. Then the girl who asked her to quiet down feels judged, is compelled to defend herself, and the situation only gets uglier from there.

A bad side effect of such circumstances is that now the white girl will be afraid to ask any other neighbors to keep it down when they are being noisy, even though they may not be as overly sensitive to supposed racism as the aforementioned neighbor.

Or worse yet, she may resent the black girl for calling her racist and nurse a grudge. Any chance of friendship between the two women is now obsolete due to the jumping to conclusions of the black girl and the timidity or resentment brooding in the mind of the white girl.

Situations such as these only serve to widen the gap between races. A non-racist white girl having a bad experience with the black girl will now be wary of speaking to black people for fear of offending them, or worse yet, hold contempt for black people thinking they will all just jump to conclusions every chance they get and accuse her of being racist, a very dangerous and detrimental stereotype.

My clash-mate Angel hates that people will describe a person by the color of their skin, but also hates when people say they do not see her color, just her as a person.

To me, that is something of a double standard. Color words are adjectives and not racist unless you take them that way. It is all in a person's perception. If I add people's race into my sentence describing them, I'm not being racist. I'm trying to make clear who I'm talking about.

Racism works both ways. We all need to work not to take every single comment in offense. We all need to see each other as humans rather than races.

Yes, our different heritages should be celebrated and expressed, but the stereotypes need to be erased from our minds, and we need to see the people inside more than the color of their skin.

Students remember cancer victims at Relay for Life

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Hundreds of K-State students and Manhattan residents stayed up all night on Friday, and it wasn't because they were partying.

They were walking in the second-annual K-State Relay for Life from 6 p.m. to 6 a.m. at Memorial Stadium.

"We walked to symbolize the fact that cancer doesn't sleep," said Michele Moorman, co-chair of the Relay for Life committee and senior in life sciences.

"So Friday night, we didn't sleep."

Teams brought food, games and drinks while they camped out in the stadium. They walked around the track all night long, making sure at least one person from each team was walking at all times. The first lap was the "victory lap" for cancer survivors.

"We're real appreciative of all the survivors that came out and walked," Moorman said. "It lets everyone else see who they are walking for."

A luminary ceremony was held at 10 p.m. There were paper luminaries placed around the track, each honoring a cancer victim or survivor.

"We lit all the paper bags and read all the names on them," Moorman said.

"It was a solemn moment for people to reflect. It's pretty emotional."

Jill Oswalt, co-chair of the Relay for Life committee, said the luminaries were her inspiration.

"When I started to get tired, I would look down and see the names on the paper bags. That's why we're here," she said.

"Staying up all night is not a big deal. I can be here."

Almost everyone had different strategies for staying awake.

Ashley Moneymaker, sophomore in elementary education, said her team bounced around a lot.

"We brought a trampoline," she said, "and a lot of food."

Moneymaker said she participated in the event because the disease hits close to home.

"There's a lot of cancer in my family," she said. "And this is a good way to raise money for a good cause."

Jim Ondick, senior in human resource management, said he participated because he's a cancer survivor.

"I did this last year, too, but I left after the victory lap," he said.

"This year I was in a team with friends, so I stayed the whole time."

Ondick said the event was a good opportunity to realize that many people have been affected by cancer.

"It's surprising to see a lot of the people who have experienced cancer," he said.

"A lot of people don't talk about cancer, but it has probably touched just about everyone. This brings awareness so we can see that other people are dealing with it, too."

Tibi Marin, cancer survivor and American Cancer Society ambassador, said she has participated in Relay for Life for 12 years.

"I do this for Dr. Terry Johnson and for one of my friends," she said.

"Last year I went to D.C. to talk to the government about cancer research and funding."

Marin said she keeps trying to be a strong voice for ACS.

"It's fantastic to be able to give support to patients," she said.

"I couldn't stay all night, but I did introduce myself to a lot of the students to congratulate them. They deserve all the praises in the world."

services liaison for K-State's Club Leadership. Hanson said the club decided spring would be a good time to work with Habitat for Humanity.

"It is a more hands-on experience, and in the spring it is a nice time to be outside," said Hanson, who started working with the organization in high school.

Ross said that many students continue their commitments begun in high school through further work with the organization in college.

Alison Scott, sophomore in management and marketing, also started volunteering in high school. She is now part of K-State's Habitat for Humanity, and as a member of the group, has spent most of the year helping raise funds to pay for a house the group built last year.

"A lot of people prefer building over fund-raising, because when you work on a house you see the results," Scott said.

Sean Tassi, senior in architectural engineering, is president of the K-State's Habitat for Humanity chapter.

He said K-State groups have helped build 13 homes this year and would like to help build more houses but do not have enough volunteers.

The group would also like to develop a recycling program where organizations wishing to be part of the program would put recycling boxes in their buildings, Tassi said. Habitat for Humanity would then come and take the boxes to the recycling center.

Ross said that the organization is in need of summer volunteers as students leave.

Students interested in volunteering will not be disappointed, Scott said. She said seeing the group break ground and meeting the family receiving the home is special.

Another perk, she said, is the opportunity to witness the the community support for what Habitat for Humanity does.

"It is definitely time well spent," Scott said. "You're giving someone a home, and that's the best gift you can give."

Men's golf ready for tough field

Tulsa's Southern Hills hosts Big 12 tourney

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Twelve tournaments down, one big one to go.

K-State's men's golf team wraps up its regular season this week at the Big 12 Championships in Tulsa, Okla. The Cats are seeded fifth out of the 12-team field and will tee off in the first round at 8:50 a.m. today.

The site of the competition might be one of the toughest courses K-State has seen in a while. Southern Hills Country Club in Tulsa has played host to numerous PGA events, including 13 major championships.

Coach Tim Norris learned the difficulties of the course firsthand as he traveled to Tulsa to do some homework last week.

"I came down and played on Tuesday," he said. "The players can't play it, but the coaches are OK to play. I took some notes, and as soon as I got back, we talked a little bit about the course."

Listening to Norris' lessons was a lineup similar to the one the Cats have used all season. Juniors A.J. Elgert, Aaron Watkins and Greg Douglas will join sophomore Matt Van Cleave and freshman Josh Persons in Tulsa.

Norris said he'll be counting on veterans like Watkins and Elgert to handle the pressure.

"That's going to help us if they're able to step up," Norris said. "Unlike other Big 12 sports, we don't have a home-and-home series with all these teams. This is kind of our one chance of the year to face these teams. So I think there's some added incentive there to see how you add up with these teams."

K-State will need a solid effort from everyone to compete with the Big 12's best.

"We've played this year with only two players that have played Division I golf," Norris said. "A.J. and Aaron have stepped up at various times, but it just can't be one or two people stepping up. We're going to have to have four scores."

Norris said preparation for this week has been solid. But as the Cats head to Oklahoma, stiff competition awaits. Four teams are in the top 50 of the Golfweek/Sagarin ratings, and Texas is No. 3.

"Everybody knows how good this conference is," Norris said. "The depth, top to bottom, is pretty darn good. It will be fun."

Longhorns sweep K-State baseball

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If hard work had a spot on the stat sheet, Coach Mike Clark is convinced K-State's three-game weekend series with No. 9 Texas might have gone another way.

"We hustled our butts off. We gave tremendous effort throughout the whole weekend," he said.

Hustle, however, wouldn't translate to any wins, as the Longhorns plated 23 runs against the Cats' three to sweep K-State and run UT's winning streak over Clark's club to 12 games.

The scoring finally ended Sunday when Texas' second 12-1 win of the weekend was halted in the seventh inning by run rule.

"They hit the ball, and they hit it where we weren't," Clark said.

Wildcat pitchers surrendered 35 hits to Longhorn bats, while K-State's offense managed just 18 for the weekend against Texas' overpowering pitching staff.

"They were very good," Clark said. "They, for the most part, threw strikes and had great stuff. You could see why they're one of the top pitching staffs in the country."

Texas' Sunday starter, Justin Simmons, was one main reason. Simmons struck out seven over six innings and allowed only one run before Huston Street shut the door in the seventh with just 12 pitches.

Saturday's game provided more drama, though, courtesy of K-State ace Jim Ripley.

A week to the day after setting a career mark for strikeouts against Texas Tech, the junior put forth another stellar effort.

Ripley set a season and career high for innings pitched and strikeouts, fanning nine in an eight-inning effort for a complete game.

"It should give him a great deal of confidence, and his last two outings have been excellent," Clark said. "He's that guy we can count on to give us a quality start."

Ripley's work was overshadowed by another Texas pitcher, though.

J.P. Howell struck out 10 Wildcats and allowed just one run over 8 1/3 innings to earn the 3-1 win Saturday.

"That was one of the best-pitched college games I've seen in a long time," Clark said. "It was just one heck of a well-played ballgame."

Kevin Melcher took the loss Friday after surrendering nine runs in 3 2/3 innings.

Wildcats' offensive guns on target

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For Eli Roberson, Darren Sproles and James Terry, it was just another day at the office.

The trio, each of whom led the Cats in yards at his respective position during the 2002 Pacific Life Holiday Bowl, was quick to morph back into December form Saturday at the team's annual spring scrimmage.

Roberson completed 16 of 34 passes for 181 yards and scored three touchdowns through the air. On the ground, he joined Sproles for 223 yards and two more scores.

Terry led the wideouts with seven catches for 94 yards and two touchdowns.

But while Coach Bill Snyder acknowledged consistency, he said the real offensive surprises lay elsewhere.

"Obviously I think the guys you know about did OK, nothing to write home about," he said. "There were some that played extremely well."

Eli Roberson runs the football in for a touchdown during the first half of the Spring Game at KSU Stadium.

Fitting into the "extremely well" category would be reserve running backs Carlos Alsop and Daniel Davis.

Last season, Alsop was slated as a running back, decided to flip to safety, but switched back and earned solid playing time behind Sproles.

On Saturday, he confirmed what side of the ball he would remain on.

Snyder addresses Bielema's arrest

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Bret Bielema, K-State's co-defensive coordinator and linebackers coach, was arrested early Friday for DUI.

According to police reports, he was involved in a minor car accident in Aggieville just after midnight.

"We had a situation this week, and one of our coaches made a terrible indiscretion," Coach Bill Snyder said. "He's tremendously upset with himself for it and rightfully so, and I'm tremendously upset with him as well. There will be very substantial consequences for that."

Bret Bielema
CO-DEFENSIVE

Bielema is in his second season at K-State after coming from Iowa to join Bob Elliott to fill the Wildcat coaching ranks.

Bielema addressed the team Friday, explaining his situation and expressing his regret about what happened.

"It's important for our football team that they understand that isn't license to make bad decisions," Snyder said. "It's not a good example, and there are no excuses for it. I wouldn't accept any, nor would I with any of our players."

Snyder said Bielema can use the incident to be a better coach, a better model for his players and a better person overall.

"We will support him just like we would anyone in our program," he said. "We'll work through it, and we'll get behind it. A valuable lesson has been learned by a very fine football coach and an awfully good person. He will be a better person because of it, and he will be a better example for our players because of it."

Haylapalooza supports Wildcat Walk

By Matthew Webber
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The weather on Saturday could not have been more perfect for an all-day bandfest and fundraiser in front of Haymaker Hall. About 300 people attended Haylapalooza throughout the warm, sunny day to have fun and support the Wildcat Walk program.

The goal of the sixth annual Haylapalooza was to "throw a party that benefits the community in some way," said Trent Smith, logistics director for Haylapalooza.

Smith said those who attended enjoyed listening to music, having fun and helping the community.

"Lots of people said they really liked the concert, and they thought the cause was good," Smith said. "But most people just liked a sunny afternoon getaway with good music."

Joe Knitter, outgoing president of Haymaker Hall Governing Board, said the event's degree of success was surprising.

"Everybody who came out had an excellent time," Knitter said. "Haylapalooza, no matter what the final outcome is with the monetary donation we make, did a lot more than anyone could expect."

The concert was free, but attendees could purchase food, T-shirts and raffle tickets to benefit the Wildcat Walk program.

Knitter said members of the residence halls and Greek houses donated money, and that local businesses donated money and prizes.

Smith estimated that the event raised $300. Haylapalooza organizers said they chose Wildcat Walk as this year's philanthropy because it is an important program that recently lost its funding by Student Senate.

"The reason why Wildcat Walk was chosen is because we saw it as a vital program to campus that was in danger of dying," Smith said. "When SGA refused to fund it, they turned it over to ARH (Association of Residence Halls). ARH didn't have enough money to fund it either, but they didn't want to see it die. So it kind of sat in limbo. Then our hall decided that it was the most needy out of all the causes that we looked at, so we decided it should receive the money."

"We choose philanthropies that need the money," Knitter said. "This year, Wildcat Walk was in dire need of funding. Since it was originally Haymaker's, we knew we couldn't let this program fall to the wayside."

Knitter also said he hoped that the residence halls and greek houses could continue to work together.

"Hopefully, this could be the beginning of acceptance between the two organizations. Just think of the possibilities of the two biggest housing organizations working together on all kinds of programs and events."

Several bands played throughout the day including Dan Bergen, Scholar, Orpheum, Dead Lemon and Three Rivers Kennedy.

"Orpheum and Three Rivers Kennedy were phenomenal," Knitter said. "This is the first time we have had the event without a headlining band."

Ben Gray, bassist for Three Rivers Kennedy, said he enjoyed playing for the crowd at Haylapalooza and contributing to a good cause.

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Andrew King, lead singer of the band Orpheum, belts out a song at Haylapalooza outside of Haymaker Hall. The event raised about $300 to benefit Wildcat Walk.

"We play a lot of benefit shows. It's a different crowd because people stop by and leave throughout the day. It's more of a festival environment," Gray said.

"It's a different feeling, and we try to do it once in a while."

Executive with record label Murder Inc. arrested in L.A. on a weapons charge

Authorities in Los Angeles have arrested an executive with rap music label Murder Inc. on federal firearms charges.

The executive, Dexter Otlley, was taken into custody on Thursday based on authorities finding a .25-caliber gun found on his desk during a search of the record label offices in January.

Prosecutors were investigating the label, home to multi-platinum rapper Ja Rule and Grammy-winning singer Ashanti, because of suspicions that it laundered drug money. Documents and computers were also seized during a search of the offices.

Harry Potter back on library shelves

The Harry Potter series is back on library shelves in the Cedarville School District, following a federal judge's order to give students access to the popular books about the boy wizard.

A secretary at the rural school district said Friday that superintendent David Smith instructed librarians to take the books out of a back office and return them to shelves. The school board voted Thursday night not to appeal the federal court order, which was issued Tuesday.

BBC official, NBC News' Ashleigh Banfield criticize cable war coverage

The chief of the British Broadcasting Corp. and NBC News reporter Ashleigh Banfield criticized U.S. cable news networks for overly patriotic coverage of the war in Iraq.

BBC Director-General Greg Dyke said U.S. broadcasters had undermined their credibility by supporting the war. He singled out Fox News Channel's "gung-ho patriotism."

None of the American cable news outlets would comment on Dyke's statements.

Meanwhile, NBC's Banfield said in a speech Thursday that cable news operators had wrapped themselves in the flag.

Need a magic wand to graduate on time?

Well, it may not be magic, but summer school at Wichita State can do some pretty incredible things — like make an entire semester disappear in as little as two weeks. It's not smoke and mirrors, just an easy, convenient way to get in a class or two while you're home between semesters. And as always, credits earned at WSU are easily transferable to K-State. So, take summer school at Wichita State, and in the blink of an eye you'll be closer to graduation and still have plenty of time to enjoy summer before heading back to Manhattan.

Enrollment is now open.

so check out WSU's schedule of courses on-line at www.wichita.edu/schedule or call 316-978-3090 to get a copy by mail and to find out how you can register on-line.

NIGHT | Women march in Aggieville to speak out against sexual violence during Take Back the Night event known to garner some catcalling from guys drinking in the bars where the march passes, this year's march encountered no opposition.

Elizabeth Altenbernd, Ordinary Women member, said she felt the march was a success, and she was happy to help raise awareness of issues facing women.

"This is an amazing event, and I don't think people know it happens all over the country," said Altenbernd, junior in women's studies and hotel and restaurant management. "There are Take Back the Night marches everywhere at all different times of the year.

"I haven't been to any other ones, but my aunt in Seattle heads up the march there."

Ordinary Women faculty adviser Michele Janette said there was a strong turnout despite the fact that they weren't able to chalk the sidewalks in the days leading up to the event because of rain. But Janette, assistant professor of English, said she was disappointed that some people were still focusing on whether or not men should be allowed into the exclusively female march.

"It's interesting to me that the question of men marching is at the forefront of some people's minds," she said. "This march is about violence against women, and one of the reasons we march without men is because these issues face us differently than they face men."

"Men experience violence, but women experience violence just because they are women."

But some are still on the other side of the issue. Dan Valentine, Clay Center, said he participated in the men's circle because he believes in the feminist movement, but was disappointed that he isn't able to march.

"I do recognize the standpoint that the march is for women to empower themselves, but if your intentions are to bring about realistic change, then you should include all your allies," he said. "Otherwise you're subject to the same mentality as dominant males."

The men's circle, which took place in Triangle Park at 8 p.m. Friday, was organized by Dominique Saunders to give men a way to support women without marching, and discuss political issues that face feminists.

Altenbernd said she thinks men should be allowed in the march, but she understands and appreciates the reasons why they are excluded.

"I think men should be allowed to participate because we live in a collective ecosystem, and we have to work together," she said. "To stop violence, everybody needs to be aware of it, so everyone participating is a great idea."

"However, I do understand that many of these women here are survivors, and their attackers have been men. And it's very hard for some to get back into bonding and being with men."

Altenbernd was still happy with the end result of the march, and was pleased that the weather cooperated. She said the main thing is to raise awareness about violence, and Ordinary Women does that. But the march isn't the only way for people to help.

"This is the only feminist group on campus, and we do an incredible amount of good, so even if I wasn't a member, I'd support them," she said. "I'd encourage men and women to learn more about feminism. I think there are a lot of misconceptions out there."

"People see feminists as all lesbians, and we all hate men, and we hate many things. That's so strange to me because feminism isn't about hate. It's about love and reaching an understanding with everyone about who we are as women."

Alsop rumbled for 100 yards and displayed a power/speed combination that had fans and coaches batting their eyes.

"He's gotten better as the spring went on," co-offensive coordinator Greg Peterson said. "When you put the ball in his hands, he can run very hard. It's fun to see him come downhill and accelerate. He's a force."

Daniel Davis also found time to shine in an unexpected role.

Traditionally a running back, Davis caught four passes for 64 yards. He has been working at both running back and receiver all spring.

Coaches say the added versatility will help him stand out in a stacked backfield.

"When you can have a guy like Daniel Davis, where you can be in a two-back formation and jump him out and get match ups, he can do those kinds of things," Peterson said.

Saturday also marked Cat fans' first chance to see the future of the quarterback position when redshirt freshman Dylan Meier and transfer Allen Webb took to Wagner Field for the first time.

Webb, who will sit this season after coming to Manhattan via Indiana, finished with 14 rushing yards and one completion through the air.

Meier completed three passes for 28 yards and one interception.

Snyder said those stats hide the potential he sees.

"Dylan's stats probably aren't that hot. He made a poor decision and threw an interception ball and probably made some inappropriate throws," Snyder said.

"But on the same token, for the first time out there, I was pleased with the progress he made."

GAME | Flag football game generates funds for Boys and Girls Club

Washington wanted the final event he was involved in at K-State to be something meaningful that would create a tradition of K-State students coming together to have fun and help the community, according to a press release.

The red team, Holla Family, defeated the blue team, Steve's Angels, 14-7.

"It was the first time I ever played full-contact flag football," Jill Halleran, junior in psychology said. "It was crazy but still fun - even though those girls were pretty competitive."

Chaytan Hill, sophomore in criminology, scored on a 70-yard interception return for Holla Family.

"I was inspired by K-State football players to come play," she said. "It was rough and intense. I think the coaches did good and prepared us well."

The women initially practiced three times a week, but during the final week, they practiced each day. Holla Family Coach Danny Morris, junior in social science, and Washington, Coach of Steve's Angels, chose which women they wanted on their teams.

During the matchup, a few fights broke out, causing several delays in the game.

"Women have a lot more emotions, and they can be out of control sometimes," Washington said. "These women have more of a desire to win than men do in football."

Despite the quarrels, the women were able to finish the game in a positive manner.

"It was a good turnout," Washington said. "Everyone came out to support, and the ladies had some fun."

Lafayette Childs II, co-organizer and senior in humanities, said the event was a good opportunity for people to see how K-State students and athletes work together to give back to the community. Although the event was not publicized because Wildcat 91.9 could not afford to make fliers, Childs said, many people came out.

"We were fairly surprised by the turnout," he said. "Most of the publicity came from word of mouth, and we were only expecting 50 to 60 people. But at least 150 showed up, so we were happy with that."

Other coaches included Ell Roberson, Corey White, Quitin Eckel, Victor Mann, Thomas Hill, Ayo Saba, Danny Morris, James McGill, Dan Dolce and Jermaine Berry.

THE FOUR BIGGEST DIETING MISTAKES

By Rick Tague, M.D., M.P.H.
Board Certified in Medical Weight Management

If you made a New Year's resolution to lose weight but have struggled...or have already failed...you are not alone.

Numerous studies show that over 90% of all self-imposed diets fail to bring about a significant long-term weight loss. Regardless of how much willpower you have, the odds are against you when dieting on your own. And with less than a 4% chance of long-term success, you may ask, "why even try?"

Fortunately, a medical specialty called bariatric medicine has discovered simple, easy-to-follow solutions to the four biggest dieting mistakes. The biggest dieting mistakes are:

1. Using a "cookie cutter" approach to choosing your diet. I call this the "one size fits all" diet. No one gains weight...or loses weight...the same way. In order to be successful your program must be individualized around your personal needs, your likes and dislikes, your medical needs, your family history, your environment, your level of stress and more. Unfortunately, fad diets call for everyone to follow the same diet forever which accounts for such a dismal success rate.

2. No medical monitoring of your weight loss. This may lead to losing muscle and even bone versus losing body fat. Losing muscle causes your metabolism to slow down and contributes greatly to eventual weight regain and makes losing weight "the next time" even more difficult. Weight loss must be medically monitored to insure that what you are eating - how often and at what times during the day - causes you to melt away fat...not muscle.

3. Attempting to fight the "cravings battle" alone. Let's face it, cravings can be an almost impossible "enemy" to fight. The reason is that cravings are hardwired into your body's natural self-protection system.

Brain chemicals causing cravings is one of the ways your body preserves itself from starvation. Of course changing your eating habits by dieting doesn't mean you are starving, but your body doesn't know that. Fortunately, using an individualized high nutrient program, adjusting meal frequency, and other medical techniques including appetite suppressants (when appropriate and only if needed), can eliminate cravings which then makes losing unwanted fat pounds easy.

4. Not recognizing there may be underlying medical reasons causing your weight gain. Obviously fad diets do not address your individual medical history nor do they evaluate and monitor blood and lab findings that can provide quick answers to your past difficulty with losing weight. A physician specializing in medical weight management is able to identify and correct hormonal imbalances and other medical problems that can be the key to a slimmer you.

Losing weight doesn't have to be an uphill battle, and more than likely past failures haven't been your fault. An individual's genetics, metabolism, medical problems, life stresses and food cravings can make weight loss on your own a very difficult undertaking. Make sure any program you undertake avoids these four common mistakes.

Also, seek a medical doctor who specializes in nutrition and medical weight management. Not all physicians have this specialized training. And if you'd like more information about how you can finally achieve weight loss success, please call my office today at 776-4443 to set up a complimentary office visit.

Dr. Tague is board certified in bariatric medicine. Dr. Tague is the medical director of the Center for Nutrition and Preventive Medicine at 1443 Anderson Avenue in Anderson Village.

A LIFE ON HOLD

Photos by Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

Vidyaranya Nanduri, a 26-year-old mathematics student from Hyderabad, India, prays in his apartment at the Jardine Apartment Complex. "God knows what is good for me and bad for me," he said. "God knows the whole picture — we can only see a focal point."

Graduate student battles leukemia while waiting for donor

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

At first glance, Vidyaranya Nanduri seems healthy. He seems normal.

He looks and acts as if he were any other graduate student, laughing and joking with friends and talking to his parents on the phone. He remains active and continues his Hindu practices.

However, this semester is anything but normal for Vidya. He had planned to finish his dissertation and begin work on his doctorate. But plans change — life changes — and now the 26-year-old mathematics student from Hyderabad, India, is fighting to stay alive. Fighting a battle against leukemia, a cancer that will kill him unless he finds a bone marrow donor.

Vidya's road to treatment began Jan. 15 when he visited Lafene Health Center for continuous nose bleeds. After another appointment at Lafene, Vidya visited an ear, nose and throat specialist for a developing throat infection Jan. 16, the same day most students were beginning their spring semester courses.

"The ENT took a sample to get throat cultures, gave me some pain killers and antibiotics and sent me to Mercy since I hadn't had any food for a day or two — just to get some nutrients through an IV," he said.

Vidya said the doctor also prescribed some routine blood tests and sent him to Mercy Regional Health Center. After completing testing and receiving the necessary nutrients, Vidya was waiting for a ride home when a nurse rushed to stop him from leaving.

"As I was about to leave, a nurse said, 'Wait here, a doctor wants to talk to you because your blood is abnormal,'" he said. "They were making a lot of calls, and all the doctors came and talked to the nurses. They didn't come to me. Only one doctor came to me and asked me to stay there a couple of days to make sure everything was fine."

Vidyaranya Nanduri has made a vow to stay positive as he fights a battle against leukemia, a cancer that will kill him unless he finds a bone marrow donor.

The next day, a hematologist told Vidya he probably had leukemia. However, he didn't cry or even seem concerned when he heard the diagnosis. He didn't know what leukemia was, nor did he realize the battle he would be facing in the coming weeks and months.

"I didn't really know what he was saying," he said. "He was ready to give Assault still being investigated

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Butler Community College student visiting K-State was found unconscious in an apartment parking lot after a large party where fights broke out.

At about 1 a.m. Sunday, Riley County Police Department officers arrived at the Woodway Apartments parking lot where they found George Taylor Zeka lying unconscious with a head wound.

Zeka and two friends were leaving the party when a confrontation between two different groups occurred. Detectives have interviewed numerous witnesses, according to a RCPD press release.

He was transported to Mercy Health Center and was later airlifted to KU Medical Center.

Capt. Gary Grubbs of the RCPD said the investigation is ongoing and no suspects have been arrested.

Zeka was not listed as a patient at KU Medical Center as of Monday evening.

Wildcat Walk seeks operating funds

Program director says K-State's Association of Residence Halls cannot afford funding

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Jim Stoutenborough wants students to feel safe when they walk on campus at night, but the Student Governing Association isn't helping in that cause, he said.

Stoutenborough is the director of the Wildcat Walk program, which provides free escorts to walk with students on campus at night. The program, however, has been defunct for nearly two years.

The Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls took over administration of the program from SGA in spring 2002 with the understanding that SGA would continue to provide funding. Stoutenborough said. But the allocations committee did not approve the funding for the program.

The escorts for the program are volunteers, but it costs money to run background checks on them, Stoutenborough said. The only other expenses are advertising and the director's salary, which he said was cut from $3,800 to $1,500 when control of the program transferred to KSUARH.

Although the money from Haylapalooza went to fund the program, Stoutenborough said it is not nearly enough to begin a stable program.

"I, personally, refuse to make people who are volunteering pay to give up their time," he said.

Student Senate Chair Laurie Quaife, formerly the allocations committee chair, said SGA could not justify investing more money in a program that was not benefiting students.

"We definitely support the residence halls in their effort," she said, "but that's too much money for a program that's not being used."

Quaife estimated that

Ann Laerzio filed a lawsuit against the Octavia Hair Design in Clinton Township, Mich., in February, claiming a shop technician nicked her finger with cuticle scissors (allegedly causing the loss of a nail) and asking for $500,000.

And in March, Ms. Robin Laybutt won her lawsuit against her former employer, the Australian doughnut maker Balfours, because of a cut on her finger (which she now says makes her unable to use her arm for any gainful employment) caused by the alleged malfunction of a doughnut machine; she was awarded $240,000.

Hyperactive seniors with guns

Wilma Bennett, 79, carrying a .22-caliber revolver and increasingly agitated at having to wait in line at a grocery store, was arrested after brawling with a 31-year-old security guard who tried to calm her down (Akron, Ohio, January).

Gertrude Raines, 84, was charged with shooting her son-in-law dead at 200 yards in the midst of a longstanding family feud (Murfreesboro, Ark., January).

Deer hunter Clinton Hurlbut, 89, pleaded guilty to reckless use of a gun after accidentally shooting the horse that a 12-year-old girl was riding (Browns Valley, Minn., November).

On the bright side, J.C. Adams, 74, owner of a Pac A Sac convenience store that was being robbed, propped himself up on his walker and fired his shotgun at the three perpetrators, killing one, wounding another and causing the third to flee (Decatur, Ga., January).

The litigious society

Widow Maggie Smith and her two adult children won $1.2 million late in 2002 (reduced from an August jury award of $3.5 million) in their wrongful death lawsuit against Dr. Franklin

Price, having convinced a jury that Price did not do enough to help the late Lawrence Smith avoid his fatal heart attack. Mr. Smith, of University Heights, Ohio, was 54, overweight, a long-time smoker who ate a poor diet, got little exercise, had diabetes and high cholesterol, and admitted to being stressed at work; Dr. Price said he gave Smith repeated admonitions about his bad habits, but apparently not enough of them.

Courtroom antics

In a January ruling on the federal Tariff Code, the U.S. Court of International Trade declared the Marvel Comics X-Men characters to be "non-human creatures," thus enraging the characters' fans, who know perfectly well that the X-Men are humans.

However, it was a Marvel Comics affiliate that called them nonhuman to begin with; the company was importing X-Men figurines, and at the time that the dispute with U.S. Customs arose, imports of "human" re-creations (called "dolls") were taxed at 12 percent while imports of nonhuman re-creations (called "toys") were taxed at 6.8 percent.

In March, a jury failed to convict Dr. Raul Ixtlahuac, 41, of sexually assaulting patients at his practice in Gilroy, Calif. (acquittal on one count, a hung jury on the other five). Ixtlahuac's lawyer believes the key evidence for his client was testimony by another doctor, who had measured Ixtlahuac's erect penis at 5 1/2 inches, which the lawyer argued made it impossible, due to the doctor's height and that of the examining table, for him to have committed the assaults in the manner that the victims described.

People different from us

In Lufkin, Texas, in January, Cody Carver, 19, was sentenced to eight years in prison for impregnating a 13-year-old girl but continued to insist that he and the girl could raise their child "if the world would only back off."

The girl's mother knew the pair were sleeping together, according to a Child Protective Services report, but since she herself had had a baby at age 14, and her mother had had a baby at 14, and her grandmother had had a baby at 14, she thought there was nothing unusual.

In a polygraph test, Carver admitted that his sexual partners had included two other underage girls, as well as a dog.

Least competent people

In Hamlin, W.Va., in January, a driver survived having her car hit by trains on two separate tracks (being knocked off one track onto another and then hit while on that track).

She was in that predicament only because was abiding my safe driver rules and had off the road to make a cell-phone call, but the place she pulled off onto was a railroad track.

Pi Kappa Phi breaks ground on rose garden

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ground was broken Saturday to signify the beginning of work on a red rose garden at KSU Gardens.

Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden, created in memory of former house mother Claudene Pillsbury, is the first campus landmark to be named after a greek house, according to a news release.

Tim Lindemuth, fraternity adviser, said it is a national tradition for Pi Kapp chapters to make donations to their universities. The idea for a rose garden began in 1998. Following Pillsbury's death in 2000, the decision was made to dedicate the garden in her memory.

"She had an incredible amount of strength and perseverance," Lindemuth said. "Everybody loved her. She was compassionate and had a heart of gold."

Pillsbury had donated $500 to the garden fund prior to her death, Lindemuth said, so fraternity members and alumni knew it was something she cared about.

Julie Lea, director of communications for the KSU Foundation, said the fraternity's gift was the largest capital gift by a student organization.

The garden will be diamond-shaped, with each side measuring about 75 feet. Construction is being coordinated by the horticulture department, and Lindemuth said work probably will begin this summer.

Ground was broken Saturday to signify the beginning of work on the Pi Kappa Phi Red Rose Garden, created in memory of former house mother Claudene Pillsbury.

The shape of the garden is similar to the fraternity's membership pin, the Black Diamond. The red rose is the fraternity's flower.

The groundbreaking for the garden was part of the fraternity's 25th-anniversary celebration, which also included a black-tie ball and a golf tournament.

Lindemuth said the chapter's relative youth among other K-State greek chapters shows the Pi Kapps' dedication to the university.

"It speaks about commitment, it speaks of vision, and it speaks about leadership," he said.

The fund-raising effort began in 1998 as part of the chapter's 20th anniversary. Students have solicited funds from alumni, as well as given some of their own money, Lindemuth said.

The original goal was set at $25,000, and Saturday's groundbreaking raised another $210, pushing the overall amount collected to more than $29,000. The additional money is being used to establish an endowment fund to pay for maintenance, Lindemuth said.

The students' dedication to raising funds is prevalent throughout the student body, Lea said.

"Its large size makes it notable," Lea said. "It's important because it inspires other groups to undertake similar efforts."

Many student groups raise money for projects, charities and scholarships, Lea said, but the Pi Kapps' efforts will have a widespread effect on the university.

"It is significant," she said, "because it provides long-lasting beautification for the university."

SGA encourages faculty to use K-State Online

Program offers updated grades, online quizzes for student access

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

An instant connection to grades, class schedules, syllabi and other academic information for each of your classes from your own home, 24 hours a day. Sound good?

It's already available for some classes that utilize K-State Online, online.ksu.edu.

The Student Governing Association passed a unanimous resolution this semester urging all K-State faculty to use K-State Online.

K-State Online has been around for about five years, Rob Caffey, director of information services, said.

"Use has grown pretty significantly since then," he said. "In 2002, we had over 62 million hits."

Different people have different ideas about K-State Online, Caffey said.

"I get feedback from a lot of people," he said. "Some people think the computer application is not user friendly, but most think it's easy to use."

Joe Aistrup, head of the political science department, said he uses K-State Online, and plans to continue doing so for all of his classes.

"I use it because it's the most convenient way to communicate with students and provide them with the materials needed for my class," he said. "It's very easy to use."

K-State Online is available to all students and faculty.

"It's available for use in all courses, whether it's just posting a syllabus or a full, Web-based online course," he said.

"We have examples of people who use all stages of it."

Though it's available to faculty, there are some who choose not to use it, Caffey said.

"The availability of support resources is misunderstood," he said. "There's not enough information about the support and assistance available."

It's just now becoming evident to professors that students want this, he said.

"To a large extent, it depends on if the faculty member makes it available, as well as what pieces and tools they decide to use," he said.

Deborah Murray, English instructor, said she doesn't use it because it doesn't work for her teaching.

"It doesn't offer features I might want," she said. "My teaching is pretty low-tech, and I use a bulletin board from another format."

If it did apply to her, Murray said she would consider using it.

"Teachers are interested in the best way to make information available to students," she said.

Anything available on the Web can be delivered through K-State Online, Caffey said.

"Messaging, chat, calendars, online assignments, grade books and supporting materials are all available on K-State Online," he said.

Rachel Chew, junior in horticulture therapy, said she has two teachers who use K-State Online, and it is very convenient.

"I like it because it makes it easier when the notes are on the computer, and I can check my grades," she said. "Everybody's busy, and it helps a lot."

In the future, Caffey said he hopes K-State Online continues to grow.

"I would like to have the system used by as many students and faculty as possible," he said. "It will be one-stop shopping for a student to get access to courses and communicate with the faculty."

Professor's study says self-service technology has social benefits

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

You may think your ATM is as friendly as a bank teller, according to a K-State professor's research.

Kevin Gwinner, associate professor of marketing, conducted an experiment last fall with a professor from Yuan Ze University in Taiwan to study human relationships and how they develop with self-service technology.

"There are three types of benefits people gain from relationships," he said. "Those are confidence benefits, social benefits and special treatment benefits."

For the study, Gwinner measured only confidence and special treatment benefits that consumers gain when using self-service technology.

"We set out to ask [if] some of the relational benefits exist when the customer is interacting with technology. Specifically, we used online travel and online bookstores," Gwinner said.

Although the study was conducted with these two venues, Gwinner said the data obtained by the experiment can be translated to be useful for looking at all customer relationships with self-service technology.

One other form of this technology would be ATMs.

"We found some of the reasons people like self-service is because they have increased control over their transactions, and others enjoy the fact that they can shop any time of day," he said.

Gwinner said they found that factors such as convenience and control lead to relational benefits.

He said that means that even though people are not dealing with humans, they experience the same feelings they would have when they are dealing with humans.

Lindsay Frink, employee at Sunflower Bank, said she and her coworkers see all different types of personalities in the banking business.

"Some people enjoy using ATMs for all their transactions, even deposits," she said. "But there are other people who would rather talk to a person face-to-face."

Gwinner said companies like Sunflower Bank may be able to use the information gained in his experiment to their benefit.

"The implications are that a company might be able to segment its market for people who are interested in different benefits," he said.

Frink said keeping the customers happy is always a main priority for Sunflower Bank.

"We are always willing to do whatever is necessary to make the customer more at ease with their transactions," she said. "If some customers prefer one-on-one attention, then that is what we give them. But if they prefer ATM service, we have that available as well."

Though Gwinner's research was only conducted on two of the three relational benefits, he said he believes research on the third would have the same results as the first two.

In the future, Gwinner said, he hopes to conduct an experiment to research the social benefits of self-service technology.

"We've got a proposal out to look at these relational benefits cross culturally," he said. "One culture may stress certain benefits more than others, and we want to see what those are."

TO THE POINT Utilize K-State Online services to full extent

K-State Online: a useful tool that isn't used enough.

The online system has valuable resources of enhancing learning outside of the classroom.

Message boards and discussion rooms encourage analyzing class information after the lecture is over. Professors should strive to cater to as many learning styles as possible, and discussion with classmates is just another way to remember the information learned in class.

K-State Online also provides archives of old tests and notes for students who are unable to attend class or need the extra practice when studying for their next exam.

In addition to better learning opportunities, the online system keeps track of homework and test grades, allowing students to track their progress in classes throughout the semester.

Although not all classes can benefit from this learning tool, the classes that can, should take advantage of K-State Online to enhance the university's quality of education.

You're gonna die down!

If I was in a monastery that's vowed to silence, and I saw a snake getting ready to bite one of my fellow monks, would I break my silence or think, "Eh, it's just his time to go?"

Pizza Shuttle rules. Gumbly's drools.

This town is full of nothing but belligerent drunks.

All right, who else is tired of hearing Angel Wilson complain about her sorrows?

It's gittin' hot in herre. Yeah, herre in the dorms. Can we get some AC up in here?

Any ideas on telling a guy you just want to sleep with him and you don't want a relationship? Help.

The K-State baseball team just got mercy ruled the second time in Big 12 play this season. Why does Mike Clark still have a job?

Look up in the trees, and what do you find? Oh my word, it's a parking Nazis sign.

So, one of the seven

POWs was at the Spring Game and the Collegian has nothing on it. Who dropped the ball on that one?

Since the women took back the night this weekend, I think us men need to take it back again so that the women can have another stupid march next year.

The Manhattan Mercury: Manhattan's number-one choice for news.

Angel Wilson has absolutely no idea what she wants. She can't decide whether to be the angry black woman who is infuriated when white people don't fall on their knees and celebrate her heritage, or to be the angry black woman who wants labels dropped so that she can sit seamlessly into society.

I think the editor of the Forum has a mullet because he never puts any of our jokes in.

Whoever threw the bicycle parking regulations sign in the tree outside Seaton should be given a medal.

Star-gazing outweighs Starbucks any night

"I'd rather wake up in the middle of nowhere than in any city on Earth."
- Steve McQueen

I was born in a small town just like John Mellencamp. I, too, am proud of being from a small town, which I define as being any place where you can count the number of stoplights off the top of your head (two in my case). Just in case you were wondering, I graduated from a small northeast Kansas town whose Indian name means, "Hey, We Got Casinos."

But being from a small town can be hard. "City folk," as we call them, are always looking down their noses from their latte mugs at you. They think you are a hick who must have been from a backwards, one-horse town who only listens to country music and probably remembers every play of his high school football career.

We laugh and say, "No, I'm not from Nemaha County," but it still stings. Eventually various versions of jokes about sheep will come into play. City folk, like Paul Restivo, are pretty clever after all.

City folk are pretty darn proud of all the great entertainment, cultural, economic and, of course, shopping advantages they have over us rednecks.

Which is all very true of course.

Just to be clear, I consider any place that has two McDonald's a "big city." But it's not like we can't get on the covered wagons and head up to the big cities to get a taste of all the fancy city life as long as the creek isn't out.

But they also have a bunch of stuff that us simple-minded country people don't want. All those lights, endless miles of concrete jungle and people constantly on the move. All the noise and friendly shouts of "Get on your side of the sidewalk, a-hole." The fact that you sit in traffic no matter where you are going. And the soulless, cookie cutter strip mall suburbs with a Chotchkie's, Flingers or Starbucks on every corner are all things that a guy like Paul may need but I can do without.

Yeah, rural life is simple. You learn about the importance of community since you know your neighbors, the value hard work from the farm, a good sense of humor from all the jokes about sheep and pigs, and how the simple things in life really are the best. In fact, 47 percent of every country song ever written has been about small towns (the rest incidentally are about beer and/or whiskey).

Small town citizens feel comfortable because you go to church, school, work, ball games and restaurants, and you know everybody. People aren't guarded and suspicious of everyone like they are in the big city. People ask about your life and really do care. You smile and give the one-fingered wave from your truck to passersby.

Of course, knowing everyone can have negative effects. Anyone from a small town knows anytime you've done something stupid, inevitably the news will actually reach your parents before you get home. But that is just because people care about each other, and because they don't have anything else to talk about in small towns.

It is also pretty laid back. People don't really care about trendy clothes or fancy cars because you really aren't trying to impress that many people. That's because we all shop at Wal-Mart or the farm surplus. Just kidding. Only half of us do.

As a teenager in a small town, you complain every day about how boring your town is. But nobody likes teenagers because they find everything boring. We were always saying, "Gee Pa, it sure would be nice if we had one of those there talking boxes."

But looking back, it wasn't that bad. We were constantly driving back and forth from Son-ic to the Main Square on a Saturday night, stopping, and then maybe repeating the route in the opposite direction. Then we'd go to somebody's field to party, go camping and fishing or steal some traffic signs. You also played every single damn sport, joined FFA and played in the band just for something to do.

But I'm sure big city kids did more exciting and intellectually stimulating stuff - like going to the movies or hanging out at the mall.

City life is great for some people. After all, someone needs to pay the taxes and bonds for sports franchises' new stadiums. But being able to sit on your back porch and watch the sun set over the rolling plains, and then seeing that fade to a crystal clear view of every last star in the heavens makes you realize the importance of simple things. The convenience of city life and all its trappings aren't worth the price of missing out on the little things.

So I'll leave the Gap stores and traffic jams to the city folk like Paul. I'll stay on the dirt road with the sheep, pigs and everybody in the College of Ag.

LIVIN' LARGE, OR NOT

No Gap to shop at when living in a hole

There are just some things about the city life that I could never give up.

Starbucks (or its sister store LatteLand), amusement parks, shopping districts, you name it. Even the little things, like the occasional mugging or drug-induced prostitute murder scandal, are things that spark my interest.

I grew up in suburbia. Kansas City, Mo., is not what I consider a thriving metropolis, but it will do. The Country Club Plaza is home to God's greatest creation for the literati: Barnes and Noble Booksellers. Only on the Plaza (pronounced plawh-zuh, of course) do you find a shopper's holy trinity: The Gap, Abercrombie & Fitch and American Eagle.

For a woman, substitute American Eagle and Abercrombie & Fitch for Express and Victoria's Secret, affectionately known as "Vickie's" to cardholders and those who can't get enough of the infamous semi-annual bra sale.

But I must clarify that it is in the suburbs that I grew up. Independence, with a population of 113,000, should not be confused with Independence, Kan., a town just shy of 10,000 folks.

Independence has a rich history. We are proud to be the birthplace of Harry S. Truman and his wife, Bess. We are proud to boast the biggest hair museum the world has to offer. That's right, 23rd Street's School of Cosmetology Hair Museum - the only place one can find statues of Cher made of strawberry-blonde locks.

But our real claim to fame does not involve presidents. It has nothing to do with being the starting point for the Oregon Trail. It has nothing to do with our nationally recognized school districts.

No. Our claim to fame lies in one little substance.

Meth.

Meth, short for methamphetamine, is better known to the small-town folks as "that therr stuff that rilly gits yuh effed up." Independence, throughout the 1990s and into the first part of this century, was known as the methamphetamine capital of the world. That's right. Just visit the city's Web site. Only there will you find everything you ever wanted to know about a tweaker - a very "effed up" person whose eye pattern moves 10 times faster than that of a normal person, mainly because they want more meth.

Only in Independence could you walk down the street and find a condemned house with signs on the door reading, "Do not enter. Dangerous chemicals may explode if tampered with. Smoke may emanate from basement. Explosives in toilets: beware."

But this is not to discredit city life. In fact, I am a better person for being exposed to all of this. Being "with it" is a part of city life and is not something a "good ol' boy" has a lot of.

Since the creation of Adam and Eve, societies have evolved into these robust, American-Eagle-plentiful, freedom-fry-producing metropolitan areas.

But if you venture outside of the city limits, out into the Valleys of Ashes (a Gatsby plug - yeah), the gene pool's shallow end is exposed. That is not to say that these are less intelligent people - well, I take that back. Let's start over.

That is not to say that a person from rural America is less of a person than I am. It is just saying that I am a lot less naive. The social skills of a good ol' boy versus that of a city folk are not what I would consider socially adept.

I have fraternity brothers from Tobacco-Spitter, Kan., that will be inept in dealing with a variety of different people. There is just not a lot of diversity in places like, say, Nemaha County. I've been there. Sure, people look differently. They speak differently. But deep down, they all have the same values of any other armpit-of-Kansas resident.

Are these values bad? No. In fact, these residents probably hold their values and morals more firmly than that of the city folk.

But only in suburbia or the great metropolises will you go to high school with, all together now, The Freakers, The Cowboys, The Preps, The Jocks, The Lesbians, The Gays, The Bible-Pushers, The Hip-pies ...

(deep breath)

... The Nerds, The Vocational Kids, The Theater Dorks, The Multicultural Group, The Drug-gies, The Bloods, The Crips and all the rest.

I couldn't have asked for a better place to grow up. If I had to choose between living alone with a Target Store nearby or living with a boat-load of people with a Tractor Supply store nearby, I'd choose the former.

If I had to choose between driving in my Saturn nude or riding in a tractor clothed, I'd choose the birthday suit.

City life is the only option for a progressive society. I have gained invaluable knowledge from the metropolis. And in all my time, I hold one thing true to my heart:

Give me flip-flops, or give me death.

Clark OK despite losses

DAN SMITH

I have to hand it to Mike Clark.

It's been a grueling season for the 17-year Wildcat baseball coach, yet even now, Clark hasn't made any excuses.

Last weekend was a perfect example.

Against No. 9 Texas on the Longhorns' home turf, odds were pretty good the struggling Cats would leave the lone star state bruised and bloodied.

Sure enough, Texas swept K-State in three games to drop Clark's club to 12-28 overall and 2-15 in league play.

So before I called Clark on Sunday to talk about the series, I played through the possible scenarios in my mind.

I remembered K-State's pre-season goals included a return trip to the Big 12 Tournament and an NCAA appearance, but as those dreams slipped further away Sunday in Austin, visions of Jim Mora appeared.

The nightmare went something like this:

"Coach, K-State's chances at a return trip to the Big 12 Tournament might seem like a longshot after this weekend, huh?" I would ask.

"Postseason?" Clark would scream back in Mora-like fashion. "Don't talk about the post-season. Are you kidding me? The postseason?"

I decided I wouldn't ask about the Cats' postseason chances, but I was worried Clark would be in a bad mood nevertheless.

That said, I opted to call Clark from the Collegian editor's office. The soundproofing would be better in there, I figured, although the room has no ceiling and paper-thin walls. Minutes later, I was on the line with Clark.

I started with a question about the Longhorns' ridiculously talented pitching staff

Golf in 4th place

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When a college golf tournament is played on a course that has hosted 13 PGA major championships, high scores are expected.

High scores are what the Big 12 men's golf teams got at Southern Hills Country Club Monday during the opening two rounds of the Big 12 Championships.

K-State sits in fourth place entering today's final round, 12 shots behind tournament leader Oklahoma.

The Cats are led by sophomore Matt Van Cleave, who is in second place following the first two rounds. Van Cleave is at 7-over-par, but trails individual leader Hunter Mahan of Oklahoma State by seven strokes.

K-State is 10 shots out of second place. Oklahoma State and Texas are both 37-over and are tied for second heading into tomorrow's final round.

Coach Tim Norris said Van Cleave played well but was surprised that he was so high on the leader board.

"That's just a tribute to this golf course," he said. "It's just really, really tough from the first hole to the 18th."

"I've been really proud of what Matt has been able to accomplish this spring," Norris said. "He worked his tail off this fall. He was out there every day in November and December."

Van Cleave anchored the Cats on Monday, with the rest of the teams scores bunched up

With Newman, Pierce gone, defense looks to fill holes

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The best cornerback is gone. The best linebacker is gone.

When Terence Newman and Terry Pierce were taken in the NFL Draft on Saturday, K-State was well on its way toward finding replacements.

As the Cats began the 2003 Spring Game, the Dallas Cowboys selected Newman fifth overall, and Pierce was selected soon after by the Denver Broncos. K-State coaches, on the other hand, were searching for their replacements.

The duo won't easily be replaced, but the players vying for their spots on the field didn't disappoint the crowd Saturday.

Senior Randy Jordan and juniors Louis Lavender and David Rose are competing for the two cornerback spots, and defensive coordinator Bob Elliott said he was pleased with their performances, but they weren't the only ones.

"Lavender and Rose played pretty well," he said. "The guy that's going to be a good player for us is Cedrick Williams. He's got the movement that you want. He's aggressive. He learns from his mistakes. We were coaching him hard today."

Noah Strozzi defends a pass to Daniel Davis in the end zone to prevent a touchdown during Spring Game on Saturday afternoon.

Elliott said he was pleased with the progress made throughout the spring, but he said there always are improvements to be made.

"It was pretty good," he said. "I'm trying to think back and remember how I felt about the defense last season. Last spring, I felt like we had some things we really needed to get better at, and I feel the same way this year.

"Maybe different things," Elliott said, "but I think we have a chance to be pretty good. We still can run. We're going to have to get stouter."

Senior captain Rashad Washington seems to be the only defensive back that won't have to fight for his spot this fall. Washington, a former running back, locked down the strong safety spot last season, the only defensive back other than Newman to start every game in 2002.

He said the whole team has improvements to make over the summer.

"We still know we need to get better at a lot of things," he said. "Basically, we were just trying to go out there and have fun."

"We're going to work on some real minor things," Washington said. "Stuff like tackling, knowledge of the

Waiting game begins for NCAA bid

All that is left for K-State tennis is the waiting game.

Until NCAA Tournament invites are issued Wednesday, Coach Steve Bietau's team can only wait to see if its season is over.

Ranked No. 41 in the nation, Bietau knows his team isn't a lock for the tournament. He also knows Saturday's 4-1 loss to Texas in the Big 12 Tournament quarterfinals didn't help the Cats' cause.

"We are close," Bietau said, "but I also remember a year where we were ranked 41 and didn't make it in. The rankings, by themselves, are not a guarantee. The question I have is, 'Are our wins good enough?'"

One victory in particular might have become critical for the Cats after last weekend. On March 9, K-State knocked off Oklahoma State in Stillwater, Okla.,

5-2. The Cowgirls were crowned Big 12 champions this weekend after defeating Texas A&M 4-1 in the finals.

"We have a good team," Bietau said, "there is no question about that. The rankings tell us that, and the teams we've beaten tell us that. The fact that we have a pretty clean record tells us that. Whether that is going to be good enough to make it in, I don't know."

The loss to the Longhorns, K-State's second in a week, was tough for the Cats to bear.

But according to Bietau, it felt no different than any other loss.

"I think they are all tough," Bietau said. "I expected that Texas would come out and play a tough match."

While K-State would like to make its first NCAA Tournament appearance since 1998, Bietau said he saw several positive things last weekend. Among those was senior Petra Sedlmajerova beating Texas Tech junior Irina

Lindsey Bauman | COLLEGIAN

Tereschenko again.

Now Bietau can only hope the positives outweigh the negatives.

"The Tech match was one that we played well enough to get through," Bietau said. "I would say that surviving and advancing to the next round is the important thing. We could have played better in that match."

Iowa State's men's basketball coach has told the school's athletic director he used "bad judgment" and made "bad decisions" at a party near the University of Missouri campus in late January.

Athletic Director Bruce Van De Velde said coach Larry Eustachy came to him and President Gregory Geoffroy this month after finding out that a student at the party had given photographs of Eustachy to The Des Moines Register.

According to The Register's copyright story, 12 photos show Eustachy during the early hours of Jan. 23 with beer. In several photos he's embracing and kissing women on the cheek or being kissed on the cheek. The Register printed a few photos in its Monday edition.

Derek Jeter hit off a tee for the first time Monday, taking another step in his rehabilitation from a dislocated left shoulder in the season opener.

Jeter said he might start batting practice this weekend. He took 20 swings off the tee and continued fielding grounders and throwing to first base.

Jeter will be at Yankee Stadium on Tuesday to talk with trainer Gene Monahan about his rehab program. The Yankees open a six-game homestand Tuesday night.

College softball | Nebraska gets regional

Nebraska has been selected as one of eight regional host sites for the NCAA Division I Women's Softball Championship, the NCAA Division I Women's Softball Committee announced Monday.

NU's selection marks the seventh time in school history that it has served as a regional site, and the first time since 1998.

Other regional sites are Tuscaloosa, Ala.; Tucson, Ariz.; Fullerton, Calif.; Gainesville, Fla.; Fresno, Calif.; Ann Arbor, Mich.; and Austin, Texas.

Each regional field has eight teams playing a double-elimination format. All regional games are May 15 to May 18.

Gregg Popovich won the NBA Coach of the Year award Monday for leading the San Antonio Spurs to the league's best record.

Popovich, the first Spurs coach to win the award, received 40 out of a possible 121 first-place votes from a panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Golden State Warriors coach Eric Musselman was second with 26 first-place votes, and Utah Jazz coach Jerry Sloan was third with 18.

The Spurs went 60-22 and won their third straight Midwest Division title under Popovich, who became coach in December 1996.

Race and gender | Women losing ground

Women and minorities are losing ground with jobs in professional and college sports, reversing a trend toward greater diversity, according to a study released Monday.

Every professional sport had lower averages for employing women compared with the last Racial and Gender Report Card two years ago, and minority hiring slipped in pro and college sports, the study found.

"While we are creeping toward fair play, we still have a long road ahead," said sports sociologist Richard Lapchick, author of the report published by the Institute for Diversity and Ethics in Sport at the University of Central Florida.

Only baseball, the NBA and NHL improved their grades for minority hiring compared with the 2001 report.

MLB | Attendance sagging

Attendance is down throughout the major leagues, slipping 4.8 percent through Sunday's games when compared to a similar point last year. And this comes on top of a 6-percent decline for the 2002 season.

More troubling, 21 of 30 teams are running behind — for teams such as the Braves, way behind — their per-game averages from last April.

Atlanta is averaging 24,133 through 16 home games, compared with 30,582 through the same number of dates a year ago. That's a decline of 21 percent — hardly encouraging for a team that's already had five straight years of falling attendance since getting a spike with the move to Turner Field in 1997.

Eleven other teams have experienced double-figure drop-offs, including the New York Yankees, down 16 percent, and Seattle Mariners, down 20 percent. Both teams lead their respective divisions.

Norah Jones and The Roots are among the performers lined up for "100% NYC: A Concert Celebrating the Tribeca Film Festival."

The free show is planned for May 9 in lower Manhattan's Battery Park. MTV and VH1 are sponsoring the concert and will broadcast it May 17.

Jones' debut album, "Come Away With Me," won eight Grammys this year, including album of the year. The pop-jazz singer also won for best new artist and record of the year for "Don't Know Why."

Actor to be arraigned May 6

Robert Conrad will be arraigned May 6 on felony charges of driving under the influence of alcohol after a car crash a month ago left a man hospitalized in serious condition, Calaveras County prosecutors said.

The actor, best known for his roles in "Baa Baa Black Sheep" and "The Wild West," crashed head-on into another car March 31 on Highway 4.

The driver of the other car suffered several injuries but has been released from the hospital and is recovering at home.

Phobias of creepy-crawlies, ordinary situations affect people's day-to-day lives

By J. Scott Bowman
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Phobia: from the Latin root phobos, to fear, is "an exaggerated fear of a particular object, class of objects, or situation," according to Merriam-Webster Dictionary.

Andrea Arnoldi, third year landscape architecture student, said she is terrified of spiders.

"Even though they're tiny, and I know that I can kill them with my pinky, I'm still afraid of them," Arnoldi said. "I am afraid that they'll have poison and will kill me. I lived in Arizona where most of them are poisonous, and I think that's where it started."

Arnoldi said if she sees a spider in her home, she has to have it killed. "First I'll yelp, which I've been working on trying to cut down," Arnoldi said. "Then I run for my roommates to kill it. I really freak out when I see a spider."

According to the National Institute of Mental Health's, more than 19 million adult Americans have an anxiety disorder, which can include phobias.

Phobias come in different shapes and forms, said Robert Sinnett, licensed psychologist with the Mental Health Associates. He said treating patients with phobias can be difficult.

"In most cases, individual psychotherapy will help to get to the root of the problem," Sinnett said.

"If it's very severe, medication can be used to relieve the patient's anxiety. Once you get to the root of the cause, you can treat the phobia."

Leah Goebel, sophomore in graphic design, said she is terrified of birds.

"When I was little, I was chased by a peacock at the zoo," Goebel said. "I've also had seagulls swoop down and take my food at the beach."

"Whenever I see birds coming in my direction, I try to get away as fast as I can."

Goebel said her friends and family are aware of her fear of birds and have looked out for her interests. She said her mom watched Alfred Hitchcock's "The Birds" and was scared enough that she has made sure that Goebel hasn't watched it.

"My mom won't go near a bunch of birds due to 'The Birds,'" Goebel said. "The movie really freaked her out. She knows my fear of birds, so she won't let me watch it."

Sinnett said the root of a phobia can come from different sources. He said one could pick up a phobia of spiders, arachnophobia, if the person's mother has a fear of spiders.

Sinnett said if there is a phobia of something such as spiders, desensitization can help treat a patient.

"You can start desensitizing a patient with something like fake insects," Sinnett said. "The idea is to expose people to safe agents that represent what they're afraid of."

The fear of the dentist is a problem for said Brian Mitchell, junior in accounting and finance. He said he's never liked the dentist, but because of one bad experience, it turned into fear.

"In the fifth grade, I got a tooth knocked out playing basketball," Mitchell said. "My nerve was hanging out and everything. We went to a crappy dentist, and he kept bumping it, and it was the most painful experience I've ever been through."

"Plus, I have a fake tooth there now, and it falls out occasionally, so it's sort of a recurring problem."

Phobias have a range of intensity, said Lia Boediman, psychology intern for University Counseling Services. She said most of the phobia-related cases they have dealt with are the most common type of phobia: social phobia.

"Usually, we see more of a social phobia where you feel anxious when you're around people you don't know," Boediman said. "It can range from a mild fear to extreme terror."

"Someone who is able to function in some situations but might feel a little anxious, like performance situations. Other times, it can get really bad."

She said they are able to briefly council people who have a mild or moderate form of a social phobia, but if they can be referred to therapists in the community.

Boediman said it is sometimes hard to know the cause of a phobia because it could be biological, chemical, environmental or mental. She said medication can help with social phobias, but sometimes that is not the case.

"If you find that medication does help, it's only half of the battle," Boediman said.

"To beat a social phobia, you must know social skills, so medication won't always work."

a hug, but I didn't realize it was such a serious problem."

That realization came later, after Vidya was transferred to Via Christi Regional Medical Center in Wichita, Kan., for a second diagnosis, and eventually chemotherapy.

"I realized there was something wrong going on when the older man in the bed next to me came and told me that he was so sorry about my condition," he said. "He said his brother had died from leukemia."

By now, Vidya is all too familiar with the disease. And after two chemotherapy sessions and weeks of treatment, he remains confident he will overcome leukemia.

For that, however, he will need a bone marrow transplant.

"The bone marrow transplant will cost anywhere from a few thousand dollars to $1 million," said Shekhar Gosavi, graduate student in mechanical engineering and one of Vidya's friends. "His insurance will only cover half of that."

Therefore, Gosavi and several others have set up a fund to cover the remaining expenses. So far, the Vidya Nanduri Leukemia Fund at the K-State Federal Credit Union has collected $105,018.86 of the group's $250,000 goal.

However, Gosavi said donations are still needed.

"People wanting to donate can mail checks, wire their donations or use the Web site for online donations," he said.

Gosavi said a bone marrow drive also is planned for Friday, May 9.

"This bone marrow drive will be for all minorities through the South Asian Marrow Association of Recruiters (SAMAR)," he said. "Through funding regulations, it will cost $80 for Caucasians, but donations are still welcome. More details about bone marrow testing, donations and Vidya's condition can be found on the Web site."

Until a donor is found and enough money is collected, Vidya and his doctors will be choosing a hospital in the St. Louis or Kansas City areas, according to insurance restrictions and treatment options. Vidya said he isn't concerned, despite the long road to recovery.

"I learned from my mother that whatever comes to you, whatever you get, is best for you," he said. "God knows what is good for me and bad for me. God knows the whole picture — we can only see a focal point. We always hope for something like, in this case, a donor or getting cured, because that is just a focal point. Only god knows what is best, so I'm happy."

between 15-over and 16-over. K-State's most experienced players, Aaron Watkins and A.J. Elgert, both struggled shooting 15-over on Monday.

Norris said knowing others on the team can step up if they don't could take some pressure of the junior co-captains.

"If they can go out and relax a little bit tomorrow and know that there will be some support out there from the three, four and five players, we could come up with a good round tomorrow."

Tomorrow the 12 teams will play the final 18 holes at the 7,016-yard course — a punishing course if a player doesn't find the fairway off the tee.

"The course is just extremely hard," Norris said. "We knew that going in. The guys did a pretty good job today, not our best golf, but I think the guys are encouraged that and clenched his teeth expecting Clark's tirade in response.

Instead, Clark calmly complimented the Texas staff for throwing strikes and playing good defense.

Next, I asked about K-State's arms, which gave up 27 runs during the weekend.

"Texas is an awfully good ballclub and they're playing awfully well," Clark finished his answer with.

Clark breezed through questions about the Wildcats' eight weekend errors and losing a 3-1 heartbreaker Saturday too with no excuses, just honesty.

It was obvious Clark wasn't thinking too much about the postseason at that point. I think improvement was on his mind instead.

Clark has been through a lot. The Wildcat coach never could have anticipated the injuries that have plagued his team this season. Neither could he have expected his pitching staff to struggle as much as it has.

He did, however, expect success this season and a return trip to the conference tournament.

That probably won't happen now, but don't expect Clark to be bitter about it.

He knows there's always next year.

WALK | Lack of funding may cause program to cease

KSUARH requested $6,000 to fund the program.

Stoutenborough said Wildcat Walk has provided no escorts in the past two years, but that it previously was a widely-used program. The residence halls controlled the program before SGA took over, and he said it was SGA that let the program fall to obscurity.

"I think that Wildcat Walk could be an excellent service," he said. "It's a shame to see something that could help students just dry up."

Quaife said SGA did not want to see the program end completely, which is why it turned control over to KSUARH. But Stoutenborough said the residence halls simply do not have the money to re-start the program.

"It's a simple matter of economics," he said.

Despite a lack of funding for advertising, Stoutenborough said word of mouth has created some interest in volunteering for the program. Without funding to complete background checks, however, the program could function only one or two nights a week.

Offering only a couple of nights of service each week would not do the program justice, he said.

Stoutenborough said he thinks KSUARH is being punished for SGA's mishandling of the program. He said the program could be on its feet again after only one year of well-funded operation. To do so would allow a solid foundation of volunteers and create interest in its use among students.

"That's the only thing that matters," he said, "to make students feel safe."

offense and defense that we know we can improve on easily."

Another battle that will materialize once fall practices begin will be the fight for Pierce's vacated middle linebacker spot. Sophomore Matt Butler had the spot locked up in the spring, but junior college transfer Marvin Simmons will arrive in Manhattan this summer and is expected to push Butler.

"He had a good spring," El-liot said. "We're counting on him being a player. Obviously with Simmons coming in, there will be great competition, but Matt won't back off."

Butler said he's excited to be next in a line of great K-State linebackers.

"I like to have high expectations for myself, and I don't want to settle for anything less," he said.

"It is exciting to play linebacker here with all the tradition. I hope that I can be part of it.

And he will continue to look for ways to improve.

"I still have a ways to go to improve a lot of aspects of my game," Butler said.

"I think I successfully improved a lot during the spring, but I have a ways to go. I am fairly happy with my play today, but I would like to be better. This summer I will try and get bigger, stronger and faster."

Panel to discuss housing issue

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan Habitat for Humanity, in conjunction with various housing groups throughout the community, is having a discussion panel tonight to educate the public on the purpose of their organizations and to provide information on affordable housing.

The panel will meet from 7 to 8:30 tonight at the Riley County Senior Center, 412 Leavenworth St.

Discussion

A discussion panel regarding housing in Manhattan will meet from 7 to 8:30 tonight at the Riley County Senior Center, 412 Leavenworth St.

Elise Lambert, executive director for Manhattan's Habitat for Humanity, said the groups have been meeting on a regular basis during the past six months to discuss issues related to affordable housing and wanted to create a panel to receive input from city residents.

"We decided the first thing we wanted to do was to create a public forum to create awareness of affordable housing issues in Manhattan," she said. "We also wanted to educate about our resources. For example, we wanted to provide information about these organizations."

Organizations involved in the panel include Habitat for Humanity, Manhattan Housing Authority, Emergency Shelter,

It could be the neighbor's child or the little boy getting on the bus.

According to recent Court Appointed Special Advocates statistics, more than 100 children in need of care were served by the non-profit organization in 2002.

Awareness of this and other statistics on child abuse and neglect was what Amy Horgan, CASA intern and senior in family studies and human services, wanted to raise Tuesday night.

"We have 130 children that we are currently serving in this area and we want people to know that it is happening right here and we want to work to reduce it," Horgan said.

About 50 people — both CASA volunteers and community members — came out in support of the candlelight ceremony that took place in the First United Methodist Church's Activity Center.

"I think it was wonderful, Amy did an excellent job of planning it," said Jayme Morris-Hardeman, executive director of Sunflower CASA. "I think we had a good turnout."

Red Cross club offers multiple means of helping others, volunteer chances

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Abby Maze has been working to localize international efforts to the Manhattan community.

Maze, president of the K-State Red Cross Club, said she was interested with the group because she wanted to become involved in emergency assistance.

"The more you do, the more you want to get involved," she said.

Maze first heard about the group through her involvement with Sexual Health Awareness Peer Educators. The Red Cross' HIV and AIDS education remain some of her primary interests following her involvement with SHAPE.

Dustin Kruse, blood services chair, said his involvement with the Red Cross Club is fulfilling.

"The goal of the Red Cross is just to help people and save lives," he said. "I don't think you can beat that."

The Red Cross Club provides opportunities for students to get involved, Maze said, including blood drives and education on disaster management, First Aid and baby-sitter training.

Some programs, such as ACT Smart, which provides HIV and AIDS education to the Boys and Girls Club, reaches beyond campus toward the larger community.

The initial purpose of the K-State Club was to provide the Red Cross with a presence on campus, said Clay Myers-Bowman, director of the Flint Hills chapter.

BANTER AND BELLOW

Different situations may require certain behaviors, but personality should show

LAYTON:

People who have outstanding character cannot hide it, and they shouldn't even think of trying to. As always, I subscribe to the ideal of staying true to self and being a real original.

People should break the rules of social interaction when they feel the rules should be broken. This, I believe, offers a more clear and direct channel of communication. It is nearly unattainable if you at all believe in showing respect to those who have earned it.

I realize that my somewhat eccentric personality is a bit much for some to handle. That said, I am left with the dilemma of just how much of my personality I should impress upon others.

The answer is to exercise a litmus test. Give them a bit more than you think they can take according to the situation.

Let's say you find yourself at a pirate party. Pirates being the savage ravagers they are, it may not be wise to be the passive person you might usually be. Tossing around high-fives may indeed bring you much closer to getting castrated with a spoon.

Instead, for your personal safety, you should grunt, fart and eat a live rat to show them how crazy you are. If they don't kill you first, you're probably "in."

However, if you were at a Pope party, talking with the Pope in his supreme Pope-ness, it would be equally unwise to suck on that very same rat. Instead you may be expected to tame the rat and make it your friend in the Pope's hope you could lead the rat towards following Jesus.

It really comes down to finding people who accept you for what you are and appreciating what you bring to the table. If you have to wear a mask to be understood, you're killing valuable time with close-minded people — and it's not socially acceptable to be a killer.

DANA:

Some book in your high school lit class probably introduced the concept of "masks" — you know, changing the way you act in different social situations.

We all do it to some degree. But some people wear more encompassing masks than others.

Changing faces is probably the reason I don't have nearly as many female friends as males. Some members of the fairer sex aren't very fair when it comes to being honest. You know the ones — they have a giggle, a wiggle and a hug for even the worst of enemies.

It's important to remain faithful to the true self. People who are willing to fake feelings or throw away their most rare qualities aren't cool. They're annoying, bland and just plain unoriginal.

But there are times when you gotta bring out the Mary Janes, Dockers or silver-plated napkin holders — the stuff of etiquette.

For example, I really like to laugh. Sometimes my favorite people are those who are easy to entertain, because all it takes is a classic D-Strong freaky-eyed stare or "Toodles" impression.

But the crooked eye and bouncy Toodles girl don't belong at any event that includes virgin punch, penny loafers or sliced ham — except a middle school dance.

It's OK to adjust to the situation you're in. A great guy, for example, looks dapper in a suit and will still race you to the rope swing.

Imagine that you are something tangible, such as some type of alcohol. You're spotted at everything from candlelight dinners to 21st birthdays. You have the ability to make those around you cry, laugh or do something really embarrassing.

Next time you step into a social situation, think: do I need to be a fine champagne or a two-day-old keg of PBR?

You decide. Just make sure you're in the clear first.

Day of Prayer encourages community participation

National event focuses on togetherness, faith

By Crystal Welborn
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

God is everywhere. This is one thing President Bush wants Americans to remember as communities around the nation celebrate the National Day of Prayer on May 1.

Manhattan National Day of Prayer coordinator Sherrill Boyd said the event, from noon to 1 p.m. Thursday at the County Courthouse Plaza, is important for citizens to attend.

"It gives the participants an opportunity to gather with others and reach out to one greater than themselves for comfort and help in times of need," she said.

The National Day of Prayer was established by Congress in 1952, and some say it has since become a part of American heritage.

"The National Day of Prayer is part of America's history it's a part of who we are and of our identity as a nation," said Mark Fried, media and marketing coordinator for

Day of prayer

National Day of Prayer will be from noon to 1 p.m. Thursday at the County Courthouse, 100 Courthouse Plaza.

the National Day of Prayer task force.

Boyd said the event will open with a prayer from Mayor Mark Taussig followed by prayers from five local pastors, a campus ministry leader and an army chaplain.

"Each pastor or prayer focus leader is free to read his or her own written prayer or give one spontaneously," she said.

The 2003 theme for the event is "Righteousness Exalts a Nation," said Susie Barnes, Kansas coordinator for the task force.

"Here in the 21st century, it is obvious that we need God's protection, we need to invite him into the public square and not kick him out," Fried said.

The task force is a nationwide organization that seeks to promote an awareness of prayer, not just today, but on a daily basis, Barnes said.

"The NDP is a significant occasion on which Americans lay aside cultural, racial and denominational differences and join hearts in prayer," she said.

Fried said the event is practiced across the country with millions of participants from children to the elderly in more than 30,000 events.

"We are a people who pray—it's a part of who we are. We are a country who makes it a point to express our dependence on God," he said. "Prayer is a position of strength. There is power in prayer."

Boyd said the event is open to the public and will be broadcast on KHCA-FM 95.3.

Fried said he encourages people to participate no matter where they are.

"We can look around the country and see a million reasons why we should be in prayer," he said.

"Right now, our leaders are making decisions that are very important, and we are asking people to pray to God for wisdom."

Brent Scarpo asks the audience a true-or-false question during his speech about hate in Forum Hall. Scarpo's speech was titled "Journey to a Hate Free Millennium."

Filmmaker addresses hate crimes

Documentary focuses on prominent American hate crimes

By Tristan Hinderliter
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Love, care and respect for yourself are all you need, a speaker said Tuesday night.

Filmmaker Brent Scarpo spoke and presented the documentary he produced and directed, "Journey to a Hate Free Millennium," at Forum Hall to an audience of about 60 people.

"We as a society are facing many fears that come in the form of hate," he said.

The documentary examines prominent hate crimes in recent news, including the murder of Matthew Shepard, the dragging death of James Byrd Jr. and the Columbine school shooting.

Scarpo interviewed family members and other people close to the tragedies to show the events from their perspectives.

Scarpo said he includes the Columbine shootings as a "hate crime" even though the victims weren't targeted based on the standard criteria for such a crime. He said it is a hate crime because shooters Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold had hate in their hearts — hate for their classmates and hate for themselves.

Racial bias accounts for 60 percent of hate crimes in the United States, Scarpo said, with African-Americans being the largest target.

In recent years, the steepest rise in hate crimes has been against homosexuals and Asians, he said. Hate crimes against people of Middle Eastern descent have also increased since Sept. 11, 2001.

He talked about the sense of brotherhood people felt on Sept. 11 and immediately following.

"On Sept. 11, we stopped terrorizing each other because somebody was terrorizing us," he said.

A hate crime occurred just four days later, however, when a man from the Middle East was targeted and murdered because of his race.

Scarpo has spoken in every U.S. state and 10 foreign countries. He is passionate in his anti-hate crusade, he said.

"It's been an amazing journey," he said. "I have finally been able to answer the question why I was born."

TO THE POINT City, campus offer chances to volunteer

This past week the Collegian has taken a look at students who volunteer their time with various Manhattan organizations.

Many of these organizations are non-profit, which means volunteers are a vital part of their continuance and growth in the coming years. Without volunteers, many Manhattan organizations would be not be able to fulfill their obligations, and consequently, would be unable to offer their services to the community.

Although a number of K-State students dedicate hours to these organizations, it's not enough.

All students should strive to volunteer at some point in their collegiate experience. Whether it's through an organization such as the ones featured this week in the Collegian or through a simple church or city event, students need to realize the importance of volunteering.

Student volunteers not only benefit the individuals involved, but the entire community as well.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Reason number 542 not to have sex before marriage: Lafene can't handle it.

When I grow up, I want to be a dinosaur so I can eat stupid people.

Angel: embrace your inner whitey.

I just found out that guys aren't turned on by burping. All these years, I've been so misled.

I think they should change the name of the Collegian to the Fourum and just get rid of all the articles.

Did I mention that my roommate is the safe-sex goddess of the world?

I didn't even eat pickles today.

Did anyone else see that huge flock of turkeys next to Seaton Hall yesterday?

You drive a fire truck? That's nice. I drive an ambulance: the only emergency vehicle with a built-in bed. Talk about a job with benefits.

You know buddy, we just watched you pick your nose for at least five minutes. That's got to be some kind of record.

Aimee Noel, will you go out with me?

Richard Nixon for president.

Maybe Wildcat Walk could find some funding if it were an important program.

Boy, I hope that's not my girlfriend saying she doesn't want a relationship.

The chicks may dig the firefighters, but the paramedics always get them out of their clothes.

Love is a delicious blend of cold and warm. There is comfort in making love. It solves no problems. But you can run away from them.

Yeah, I've seen Paul Restivo walking around campus doing that sexy walk that he does. Pretty hot.

I pity the fool that don't know the difference between tobacco-free and free tobacco.

JUST FRIENDS?

Platonic friendships between opposite sexes can exist, survive

What! No sex?

Platonic relationships – in layman's terms non-romantic relationships with the opposite sex are difficult to find in their truest form.

A true platonic relationship insinuates that both sexes feel equally about each other, and neither one harbors any romantic feelings. There is no romantic background in this blissful friendship, and both persons in the relationship wish for the friendship to stay in its current condition.

It is possible to be involved in a strictly platonic relationship. They are scarce, but definitely one of the best kind of relationships to have. After bypassing the normal train-wreck of a romantic relationship, platonic friends form a bond built on trust and common interest without the added difficulty of the maintenance of an intimate relationship.

Ignoring the potential for a platonic friend can leave the emotional subconscious lacking.

Don't get me wrong, I love hanging out with the girls. It is fun to go get our nails done and shop for a purse that will match perfectly with the shoes I bought to match the dress to match the hair clip to match the eye shadow that I bought to correlate with the lipstick.

But some days, I want to kick back and watch "The Big Lebowski" with someone who thinks that a man who dresses in a bathrobe to go to the grocery store and calls himself "the dude" is hilarious.

There are days that listening to a spiel by Rodney Kerrington and riding dirt bikes is a lot more fun than trudging through the mall looking for that perfect toe-nail polish to match that outfit I have been assembling for the last week. And then there are nights when hanging out with someone who has perfected the art of the beer pyramid is nirvana compared to discussing what products give your hair the most volume.

Women also benefit from having a girl buddy. I know y'all like to sit down and sip a beverage occasionally and talk about stuff you would never dream of telling your guy friends. Occasionally the sappy "chick-flick" is what you needed to watch after a typically rough week.

For both sexes, the well of advice that can be shared about the opposite genders is priceless. Platonic friends can advise you on Valentine's gifts, ideas for dates and your overall game. The walls of the cliché that women are from Venus and men are from Mars come crumbling down when we allow ourselves to be open to a strictly friend-based relationship with someone who uses a different bathroom.

I do believe people form stronger platonic relationships based on their siblings and the experiences they had in childhood.

I have three brothers – so I am quite comfortable hanging out with the boys. However, my best friend's ex-girlfriend didn't have the same childhood experiences I had. She was an only child. And that is why she broke my friend's windshield for talking to me and went through his house and burned every picture that included me.

People who grow up without siblings of the opposite sex can form friendships as children or with extended family – but if they grow up without forming friendship-based relationships with the opposite sex, they are not likely to see the opposite sex on a friendship basis in the future.

I wouldn't trade my guy friends for the world.

With this in mind, I think I'll go watch "Deuce Bigalow" and drink some Natty Lite.

Kathryn is a junior in public relations. You can e-mail her at krh5588@k-state.edu.

Close male-female relationships can lead to physical attraction

Ah, friendship – one of those feel-good words that brings holding hands, smiles and magical hugs to every boy and girl who loves butterfly kisses and Happy Meals, making them feel special and alive.

It's so easy to be friends because guys only think of girls as study-buddies, and girls don't like boys with cooties who chase them around the playground in "friendly" glee.

Let's jump off the swing set, away from the ice cream man and the column next door, and tell me the last time you had a worthwhile relationship that didn't start with the informal tag of "friends."

How many times do one-nighters, bar hookups and "how you doin'" really amount to anything of substance? We're about to walk through why there is no such thing as a purely platonic relationship.

The first step to anything is always the first impression. This gives both parties the opportunity to check out the goods and engage in two potential types of transparent and utterly superficial conversation like, "Where did you go to high school?" or, "What's your major?"

On the other hand, there's the second option. You can overwhelm your new buddy with questions of a seemingly deeper, more personal nature like, "What do you want to do with your life," or my personal favorite, "If you could have one wish, what would it be?"

Now here's where you have to hope to God that they don't bust out the, "yeah, that reminds me of when my boyfriend and I..." OK, STOP. So, short of pulling off some shady business, you're stuck in "Limbo Land" or the "Just Friends" category.

With Limbo Land, you've managed to score just enough points to land the coveted, "If my boyfriend was a total ass to me, I might consider you" spot, so be proud to be on the "This chick owns me, I'm a tool" team. You must avoid getting moved to "Just Friends."

This means time is your enemy. If a month passes by and you haven't busted out the "bag o' subtle seduction," the Luv Train may be leavin' the station, leaving you with the feared "WALL." Everyone always talks about it, but what is it? Simply put, it's something you'll never ever be able to climb or jump over to get back to Rapunzel.

So you're stuck. She's gotten too comfortable with you. You've had too many revealing conversations, and now you know way too much about each other to be considered anything more than "good friends."

You've effectively locked the relationship chastity belt, and there's nothing to do but give her the key, muster a smile and hope the groundhog doesn't see its shadow. And we all know that it always does.

After we let the dust settle, you're now both "strictly friends." And that means both of you are even more in love. She's just in subconscious denial and hasn't realized it yet. So what happens from here?

Desperate times call for desperate measures. You can tell her how you feel, and either she'll confess that she likes you too, or she still thinks of you as a friend, and then you get black-listed.

Not only is there a wall, but you're on the "LIST." Congratulations – you're on the list of people not-dateable! Forget it, move on.

Or you can simply keep it all inside and just keep telling yourself that you guys are purely platonic. An anonymous source once said,

"I had a platonic friend once. Then I slept with her." Case in point.

TO THE EDITOR

Columnist should consider validity of arguments before presenting them

Editor,

This is in response to Angel Wilson's opinion on racism. If Angel Wilson represents the Collegian as a writer who follows her arguments correctly, then there need to be improvements in the staff.

First of all, the fact that this "black" female refers to herself as a "black" female demonstrates personal lack of enthusiasm in her racial standing. We all know that she should be calling herself an "African American."

Did not African Americans in the 1990s nag to be called "African-American?" Although this point may seem trivial, it is important that those reading Angel's column should know about this type of clarification.

Second, as Aimee Noel pointed out in her column, Angel wants to be identified as a "black female" by those trying to be sincere to her but only as a "female" by those talking about her.

Where is the moral plane of that point? If Angel Wilson was an excellent journalist, then she would be the first to know that her arguments must follow one another instead of contrast one another.

Third, Angel Wilson needs to understand what constitutes a minority in the United States and particularly in a conservative state such as Kansas.

I am a Hispanic-Filipino, and I know I am a minority. Angel, you are a female, and you are African-American. You are a minority.

I am not intending that by being a minority one should expect differential treatment by anybody, but minorities need to know that they are unique and that sometimes being unique calls for unique description. Oh wait, Angel does not want that. Or does she? This is my point exactly.

Lastly, when Angel Wilson says it is not the people of color bringing race into the question, she is wrong. Think about this. What percentage of racial complaints are represented by the Caucasian people? The answer is obvious – very little.

Caucasians, a.k.a. "white people," are not the ones complaining about racism. The minorities are. This is as obvious as it gets, and Angel failed to realize this.

Stephen Covey wrote in "The Seven Habits of Highly Effective People" that individuality comes from controlling your mind, and that your mind is the one thing that oppression cannot control.

Maybe Angel Wilson needs to open up her mind a little bit and make sure her arguments are valid before presenting them to the students and faculty.

IRAQI PROTEST | Soldiers fire at disruptive pro-Saddam crowd

none of the Iraqis was armed or throwing rocks, and that the shooting lasted about 30 minutes.

Soldiers at the scene said many in the crowd had AK-47 assault rifles and were firing into the air — a common practice at boisterous events. But the soldiers said they opened fire only after shots were fired at a school in which they were headquartered.

The incident in Fallujah — a predominantly Sunni Muslim area that provided strong support for Saddam Hussein's Baath Party — was the third reported fatal shooting involving U.S. troops and Iraqi protesters in the past two weeks, underscoring the problems facing soldiers whose training focuses more on combat operations than crowd control.

The shootings, widely reported by Arab news media, have served to fuel growing resentment of the U.S. military presence in Iraq only weeks after the overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime.

U.S. Central Command said in a statement that paratroopers of the 82nd Airborne Division were fired upon Monday night by about 25 armed civilians mixed within an estimated crowd of 200 protesters outside a compound they were occupying.

"The paratroopers, who received fire from elements mixed within the crowd and positioned atop neighboring buildings, returned fire, wounding at least seven of the armed individuals," the statement said.

The 82nd Airborne Division has one battalion spread out around Fallujah, and a company of 150 was inside a school that serves as its headquarters when the shooting took place, soldiers said.

"We saw three guys on the roof firing into the (school) building," said Sgt. Nkosi Campbell, pointing at the house across the street from the school. "Everybody could see the muzzle flashes."

Saying his troops acted with restraint, he said his men were worried about the rules of engagement — whether they should open fire.

"They turned around and said, 'Hey, Sergeant, can we shoot?'" Campbell said. "That was when they were already receiving fire."

Col. Arnold Bray of the 82nd Airborne Division said there were infiltrators in the crowd, including some who were armed and on nearby rooftops. "Which kind of schoolboys carry AK-47s?" Bray asked.

Area Agency on Aging and the Manhattan Housing Partnership. In addition, Mayor Mark Taussig and Jason Hilgers, Manhattan redevelopment coordinator, will be available to answer questions.

Another reason the organizations decided to have a panel was from a housing study the city did in 2000, Lambert said. The study provided 25 steps for city improvements that should be completed by 2005.

"There were 25 steps, and so far the city has done one of those 25 steps in relationship to housing," Lambert said. "Obviously there's some gaps, and as a city and a community we've never followed up on these."

Lambert said the panel will begin with each organization giving an overview of what the group does, and will conclude with a question-and-answer session with a mediator.

Taussig said he encourages interested residents to come to the panel to learn more about each organization.

"There is an awful lot of creative ideas that are being initiated plus what is already in progress," he said. "I'm looking forward to it. I'm sure that I'll learn about what the opportunities are."

Lambert said the organizations sent out invitations to the community, notably students in social science classes.

"We sent out invitations specifically to some student groups because these are things that no matter what community they work in, they'll have to deal with them," she said.

"Housing is a basic need. It's a good learning experience for them."

CASA | Candlelight event highlights negative effects of child abuse

CASA is a non-profit organization that trains volunteers to speak for the best interest of children who are brought into the judicial system.

As a district judge, David Stutzman sees cases involving neglected and abused children.

"Awareness is a big problem in Manhattan because people think these things don't happen in nice places to nice people and most of you here know that is simply not true," he said.

The event began with an opening statement from Horgan, who organized this event as part of her internship. She planned the event to coincide with National Child Abuse Prevention and Awareness month.

"People ask why April, the first full month of spring, is dedicated to such a dark topic as child abuse and neglect," she said.

"Spring is a time of new beginnings, and creating a new beginning for children is what we are all about."

Stutzman delivered the keynote speech and focused mainly on the importance of prevention when it comes to child abuse.

"Prevention makes a difference. Child abuse effects all of us. It impacts you and me and the children and their children and their children's children," he said.

Stutzman also swore in about 35 volunteers at the ceremony, including about 15 new volunteers.

A slide show of photographs of the volunteers of the past three years played.

"As a CASA volunteer, I have a lot of power in a child's life," Morris-Hardeman said. "It gives me a chance to give a child hope and someone who loves them."

As the ceremony neared its end, two volunteers lit 103 candles, one representing each of the children the organization helped this year.

"We hope that we raised awareness of child abuse in Riley County," Morris-Hardeman said. "Child abuse happens here, too."

As the candles were being lit, "Concrete Angel," a song by country star Martina McBride, played. The song is about an abused girl who was eventually killed by the abuse while neighbors heard, but did nothing.

"What can one person do?" Horgan said. "In the case of abused children, one person can do a lot."

Baseball prepares for season's 3rd meeting with Wichita State

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The third time usually hasn't been a charm for K-State this season.

Still, the Wildcats (12-29, 2-16) will face Wichita State (31-18, 12-8) at 7 tonight at Eck Stadium with hopes of toppling the Shockers. The win would mark the first for K-State in three chances against Wichita State this season.

The first meeting went pretty well, for a while.

On March 26, K-State took a 4-3 lead into the sixth before things got dicey for Jonathan Gutierrez.

WSU loaded the bases, and sophomore second baseman Phil Napolitan collected his first home run as a Shocker in dramatic fashion. Wichita State would add six more in the seventh, lead by as many as nine and hold off a late Wildcat charge to win 14-10.

Coach Mike Clark said the second meeting, an April 9 matchup, wasn't the Cats' best effort either.

"When we went down there the last time, I thought it was our worst game of the season," he said. "I thought we played horrible, and I was really disappointed. The effort was there, but the execution wasn't, particularly from the pitching standpoint."

Wildcat pitchers were shelled for 13 runs while the offense mustered just two, as Wichita State extended K-State's losing streak to 13.

First baseman Tim Doty, hitting .351 with eight home runs and 35 RBI on the season, said K-State is looking to bounce back after dropping three in a row to Texas last weekend.

"We're looking to get back on track," Doty said. "But they've hit well and pitched well against us, so it's going to be tough. We're just looking to go out and get some outs pitching and defensive-wise, and we need to take advantage of the opportunities we get at the plate."

Taking advantage of opportunities at the plate hasn't been the Wildcats' strong suit this year. Losers of four Saunders fills key hitting role after Soto injured for season

Perseverance pays off.

Zack Saunders knew when he was left out of the starting lineup during early season games that he'd have another chance.

When junior Ty Soto went out with a season-ending wrist fracture on April 13, Saunders got what he'd been waiting for.

"Losing Soto was a really big blow to us because he was our hottest hitter at the time," Saunders said. "I knew there were big shoes to fill, but if I focused on that, I'd spiral out of control."

Instead, Saunders has been in complete control.

In his breakout game against Texas Tech on April 18, Saunders belted a two-run home run in the bottom of the ninth to give K-State its first win in 16 games.

Saunders hit .467 against Tech, ripping three homers and driving in eight RBI. Those numbers earned him Phillips 66 Big 12 Player of the Week honors.

"It's a situation where he's been forced to do it," Coach Mike Clark said. "He's having competitive at-bats, and we have to have that with the injuries."

Saunders' success doesn't overshadow the loss of Soto, however. The first-team All-Big 12 third baseman was leading the team in nearly every offensive category when he went down.

While replacing Soto remains a tall order, Clark said it is best done when Saunders doesn't try to do too much.

"We don't want Zack to be Ty Soto," Clark said. "We just want him to be the best Zack Saunders he can be. He's done a nice job for us, and I'm happy for him and the success he's having."

While the numbers have been similar, their style of play hasn't, senior Tim Doty said.

"They both are real good competitors," Doty said. "Ty has a little more experience and probably puts the ball in play a little better, but Zack has a little more power potential."

Saunders attributed his recent hot bat to once again becoming comfortable in the starting lineup.

"It's nice to walk by the lineup and not have to see if I played well enough to play the next day," Saunders said.

That comfort level has been widely noticed, Doty said.

"He's a lot more comfortable now that he knows he'll be out there every day," Doty said.

Now a mainstay in the starting lineup, Saunders is making the most of another chance.

"When Ty went out, I knew the job was there for me to take," Saunders said. "I knew I was going to get my shot to start somehow, some way."

Columnist shares 'letter' to Eustachy

Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy has been seen partying at K-State and Missouri in the last couple years. Searching through his trash, I uncovered undeniable evidence. It appeared Eustachy attempted to burn the letter, but the perfume-and-lipstick-covered paper refused to light.

I know I gave you my number. I remember how you entered it in your phone as "Hottie." That was so sweet. Maybe I don't have your number right, though. You didn't actually enter your name in and you misspelled "Big Stud."

K-State golf team finishes in 6th in Big 12

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State came off the 18th green Monday at the Big 12 Championships in Tulsa, Okla., the players felt good about their position in the field.

The team was in fourth following the opening two rounds, but the final round Tuesday was a different story.

K-State finished in the middle of the field with a 927 total score, good for sixth place, but the Cats tied two other teams for the highest round of the final day at 320.

Although the Cats stumbled down the stretch, Coach Tim Norris said he was proud of K-State's highest position ever at the Big 12 Championships.

"It was just a difficult, difficult day," he said.

Southern Hills Country Club troubled K-State players for the second straight day. But Norris said it was fatigue as much as anything that plagued the team Tuesday.

"We were just tapped out after yesterday - mentally," he said. "It was such a long day on such a difficult golf course. It was just tough to come back out this morning and get that energy going."

Texas won the Big 12 crown, finishing at 54-over for the two-day event. Oklahoma

State junior Hunter Mahan won the individual title by 13 strokes, finishing at 2-under, the only player to finish under par for the tournament.

Sophomore Matt Van Cleave, who finished 16th, led the Cats. Van Cleave was in second following Monday's action, but faltered Tuesday with a 13-over 83.

K-State's next action is closer to home. The Cats will compete in the NCAA Central Regional at Colbert Hills Golf Course on May 15-17.

Norris said that throughout this season, his players have proven how well they can play.

"We've got a good team," he said. "We've got good players. When they all play together, and all play together well, some great things are going to happen"

Horse racing | Thoroughbred legend retires
Laffit Pincay Jr., whose 9,530 career victories are the most by any thoroughbred jockey, retired Tuesday, nearly two months after breaking his neck in a spill at Santa Anita.

Pincay, 56, was severely injured in a turf race March 1 when another horse that was ultimately disqualified swung wide into the stretch, knocked Pincay off his mount and rolled on him.

At the time, the injury didn't appear serious and Pincay was treated at the track and released. When the pain persisted, he was examined by doctors, who found two breaks in the same bone in his neck. He had been wearing a halo brace to heal the breaks.

NBA | Kings' Jackson earns Sixth Man award
Sacramento Kings guard Bobby Jackson won the NBA's Sixth Man of the Year award on Tuesday.

Jackson, the runner-up for the award last season behind Toronto's Corliss Williamson, received 52 of the 118 first-place votes from a panel of broadcasters and journalists.

Jackson got 362 points in the voting. Milwaukee shooting guard Michael Redd finished second with 257, and Utah forward Andrei Kirilenko was third with 127.

Jackson, the Kings' undersized offensive spark plug, is just the second point guard to win the award, along with Orlando's Darrell Armstrong in 1999.

MLB | Martinez suspension reduced
Cardinals' first baseman Tim Lincecum had his suspension for actions in a brawl with the Arizona Diamondbacks on April 20 reduced to three games on Tuesday.

Martinez's suspension was reduced on the condition he begin serving it immediately, meaning he'll miss a three-game series with the New York Mets starting Tuesday night. He dropped his appeal after a conversation with two major league baseball officials, on the advice of manager Tony La Russa.

Hockey | U.S. falls to 0-3 in world tourney
The United States lost its third straight game at hockey's world championships, beaten 3-2 by Russia on Tuesday in its final game in the preliminary round.

The winless Americans stood no chance of advancing entering the game, and this week will play in the relegation round for the first time since 1998.

This was the best game yet by the United States, which lost 5-2 to Denmark in the opener and then 1-0 to Switzerland.

NAIA | Three schools added to association
The NAIA has agreed to add three new schools to its memberships: Davenport University in Grand Rapids, Mich., Johnson & Wales University in Denver, Colo., and Waldorf College in Forest City, Iowa.

The three schools will begin their membership on Aug. 1.

Former world champion Elvis Stojko is making a comeback, planning to return to competitive figure skating next season.

The 31-year-old Canadian retired after last year's Salt Lake City Olympics and has been touring the United States the last two months as a member of the Champions on Ice cast.

Youth sports | New York coach sued
An influential New York City youth basketball coach who was forced to resign last year amid accusations of sexual abuse was sued by one of his former players.

The lawsuit against Ernest Lorch was filed in U.S. District Court Monday by Robert Holmes, according to the office of Holmes' lawyer, Lawrence W. Luttrell. The lawsuit asks for damages in excess of $100,000.

As head of the team at Manhattan's Riverside Church for three decades, Lorch coached more than 60 future NBA players, including Chris Mullin, Mark Jackson, Stephen Marbury, Ron Artest, Elton Brand and Jerry Stackhouse.

NFL | Chiefs sign free-agent corner
The Kansas City Chiefs signed free-agent cornerback Darius Johnson to a one-year contract Monday.

Johnson played in 61 games for the Denver Broncos from 1996 until 1999, making four starts. He was a member of the teams that won two Super Bowls, but was waived by the Broncos in 2000.

Johnson signed with the Tampa Bay Storm of the Arena Football League in 2002, but was waived before the season started.

I have to tell you. I know you told me to keep "us" a secret, but I had to tell somebody. I was so happy the next day that all my sisters around the house knew something had happened. I finally bought that necklace, too. I put the tab you ripped off your Natty Light can on it. I know you have been really busy recently, but do ya think maybe we could meet up sometime? Maybe you could take me out in Kansas City. We need to get to know each other better if we are still going to run away like you promised. I've been laying out every day so I can look good in Hawaii. I know ... it's all kind of weird, isn't it? Some of my sisters don't believe me when I tell them about it, though. They say you're too old. One girl (she's a skank and I hate, hate, hate, her) said you were 37 years old. I know that's a lie. You swore you were only 25, and you're too sweet to lie, snookums. OK, now I have a really important question. My formal is next week, and I was wondering ... maybe ... if you weren't too busy with your school work ... and maybe wanted to see me again ... and maybe could borrow the university jet that maybe ... well ... can you come??? Well, I gotta go. There's a huge kegger down the street. You'd probably have a great time if you want to come. Don't forget to call me. I can't wait to see you again!

straight, the Cats rank second-to-last in team batting in the Big 12. But as bad as K-State's bats have been in 2003, the Cats' pitching has been worse. K-State ranks last in the conference in overall pitching. Wichita State, in third place in the Missouri Valley Conference, hasn't had the in-conference struggle the Wildcats are enduring. The Shockers are second in the conference in team batting and lead in pitching. K-State left fielder Pat Maloney, hitting .315 with 12 doubles and five homers, said the Shockers have few holes. "They play well all around," he said. "They hit the ball well, they pitch extremely well, and they play good defense. They do everything they can to get a W, and that's the way we need to play, too." Clark said Wichita State is loaded like another team K-State just played – the Texas Longhorns – but added the Wildcats are capable of beating teams of that caliber. "Texas is one of the best in the country," he said. "Texas could win it all again this year. Very easily. They've got everything. They're one of four teams in the league who could get to the College World Series and have a chance to win it. "Wichita State has the potential to do that also. They have just as good of arms as anybody. But for whatever reason, the execution isn't there. They're a doggone good ball club and we're going to have to play well to win. But we can do that."

VOLUNTEER | Red Cross campus club activities include blood drive

"It's a bigger picture thing," he said. "It's fostering a life-long commitment to the Red Cross. It's a way to connect and make a relationship." The club was founded in fall 2001, Myers-Bowman said, to help connect the Flint Hills chapter with a great resource of personnel – the campus.

Although the club has not met his original expectations, Myers-Bowman said he expects the club to continue its growth. The club has been recognized nationally for its efforts in starting a club in a university setting, he said, and other state institutions are looking into starting their own Red Cross clubs. "People will know, trust and respect the organization. Red Cross training and experience is transferable to lots of different places," he said. One of the most visible activities of the K-State club is its blood drive, Kruse said. Earlier this month, the club collected 908 pints of blood, surpassing its goal of 700 and completing its most successful blood drive in 10 years.

The club provides plenty of opportunities for students to volunteer, Maze said. The combination of small activities and services the club provides quickly combine to make an impact on the community. "We always have something someone could be doing," Maze said. "You get training as you go, so you can really jump right in."

OBSESSIVE LIFESTYLES

Obsessive-Compulsive disorder disrupts daily lives of those affected

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Remember to lock the front door? Turn off the oven and iron? Those who suffer from an obsessive-compulsive disorder obsess about such thoughts to the point that these obsessions can ruin their lives.

"Understanding where these thoughts come from will help them manage their behavior," said Lia Boediman, psychology intern at University Counseling Services.

"We educate clients about OCD and teach them to learn how they can manage their symptoms."

Boediman said that, according to research, cognitive behavioral therapy has a high rate of success in treating OCD, but that medication is also an option.

Boediman said the newest research about OCD indicates that the root of problems is found in the brain.

John Fajen, licensed psychologist at Pawnee Mental Health Services, said anti-depressant drugs can be used as preventive measures to avoid serious OCD symptoms.

Whether an expert would prescribe medication, therapy or a combination of the two, Boediman and Fajen both said different treatments work for different patients.

"A lot of studies have been done, and nothing is complete," Boediman said. "If it is a biological problem, then medication will probably help. But cognitive behavioral therapy has been proved to have a high rate of success in anxiety disorders, including OCD."

Fajen said that in addition to being disruptive, OCD can also be destructive. Some people compulsively engage in sex, gambling or risk-taking because they cannot stop.

Despite the problems associated with OCD, Fajen said that it could be productive if present in a milder form.

"A person might be compulsively tidy or compulsively early. Freud once said that if you're going to have a psychological disorder, then OCD would be the best," he said.

"If I were an employer, I would look for someone who has compulsive tendencies."

On one end of the spectrum is compulsive moral rigidity, but the other end is compulsion toward dangerous behavior.

"People with OCD tend not to have much fun, or be much fun to be with, because they have a hard time relaxing or being socially functional," Fajen said.

If someone is concerned about a friend who has compulsive tendencies that are disruptive, Fajen said a series of steps can be taken.

"I would express my own opinions and concerns first. Then I would identify the behaviors and ask them if they think it's a concern," he said.

"If it's not, then I'd just leave it at that. If they do think it is a problem, then I'd ask what I could do to help."

Fajen said OCD isn't very common during the later part of life when most people are comfortable and are beginning to slow down. He added that OCD isn't common for children under the age of 10 unless they have strict and restrictive parents and fear disappointing them.

"You see it when someone is approaching a problem and has a

Defining the disorder

The following are the criteria for obsessive-compulsive disorders according to the fourth edition of "Diagnostic and Statistical Manual," which is the classification system published by the American Psychiatric Association.

■ Obsessions

1. Recurrent and persistent thoughts, impulses or images, that are experienced at some time during the disturbance as intrusive and inappropriate and cause marked anxiety or distress.
2. The thoughts, impulses or images are not simply excessive worries about real-life problems.
3. The person attempts to ignore or suppress such thoughts, impulses or images, or to neutralize them with some other thought or action.
4. The person recognizes that the obsessional thoughts, impulses or images are not a product of his/her own mind.

■ Compulsions

1. Repetitive behaviors (e.g., hand washing, ordering, checking) or mental acts (e.g., praying, counting, repeating words silently) that the person feels driven to perform in response to an obsession, or according to rules that must be applied rigidly.
2. The behaviors or mental acts are aimed at preventing or reducing distress or preventing some dreaded event or situation; however, these behaviors or mental acts either are not connected in a realistic way with what they are designed to neutralize or prevent or are clearly excessive.

Common types of OCD

Obsession: Contamination fears of germs, dirt
Compulsion: Washing

Obsession: Imagining having harmed self or others
Compulsion: Repeating

Obsession: Imagining losing control of aggressive urges Compulsion: Checking

Obsession: Intrusive sexual thoughts or urges Compulsion: Touching

Obsession: Excessive religious or moral doubt Compulsion: Counting

Obsession: Forbidden thoughts
Compulsion: Ordering/arranging

Obsession: A need to have things "just so"
Compulsion: Hoarding or saving

Obsession: A need to tell, ask, confess Compulsion: Praying

risk of failure," Fajen said. "Someone like an honor student who doesn't want their first B. They want to stay perfect. They have a fear of being judged."

Tom Grimes, professor of mass communications, worked with children who had OCD at the Menninger Clinic in Topeka.

Grimes was conducting an experiment to see how viewing violent television affected children with disruptive behavioral disorders, which he described as a cluster of anxiety disorders and separate from OCD.

Because many of these children also had OCD, Grimes said that if the OCD overwhelmed the disruptive behavior disorder, the child was omitted from the study because "you can't fully judge their harmful actions."

One of the children Grimes saw at the clinic compulsively fiddled with the heel of his socks, causing holes to form in them.

"The important thing was to not get aggravated with them and to understand that they cannot stop themselves."

Judge dismisses lawyer's complaint against John Fogerty

A Manhattan, N.Y. judge has turned a deaf ear to a lawyer's complaint that he suffered hearing damage because of an "unreasonably loud" rock concert by singer and songwriter John Fogerty, formerly of Creedence Clearwater Revival.

State Supreme Court Justice Martin Schoenfeld dismissed a lawsuit that had been filed by Jeffrey Powell, 56, saying Powell assumed the risk of hearing damage when he attended the concert in the Manhattan Center on West 34th Street on June 2, 1997.

Metallica is back at 'Headbangers Ball'

Metallica will host a new version of the heavy metal series, one of MTV's earliest, when the band premieres May 10 on MTV2. "Headbangers Ball" debuted in 1987 and lasted until 1995.

Also on MTV2's spring-summer schedule is a new commentary show in which artists talk over their videos. "Track 2" follows the audio-commentary craze started by movie DVDs and combines musicians' remarks with footage from their videos.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Rusty Wilson
Local bar owner

1. What would you like to be having for dinner tonight?

"If I had my choice, I would probably have scrambled eggs, bacon and toast."

2. What is in your CD player right now or who is your favorite artist?

"Aerosmith. They have just been around for a long time, and I have always liked them. I listened to them in the '70s."

3. What kind of car do you drive?

"I have several. I drive a Denali or a pickup truck."

4. What was the last movie you saw?

"The last movie I saw was 'Anger Management.' I saw it because I thought it would be good, but it turned out to be not good."

5. What is your must-see TV show?

"Probably 'The Andy Griffith Show.' I have watched that since I can remember watching TV."

6. What is your favorite place to eat out?

"I don't eat out hardly ever, but it would probably be Taco Tico in Winfield, Kan. I have a farm down there."

7. Who is your idol and why?

"Superman because he's invincible."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?

"I don't drink. I can't sell it and drink it at the same time."

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?

"I threw my bed out of the fifth floor of Marlatt Hall. We built bunk beds, and we were taking them down and I didn't want to walk down five floors. I got kicked out of the residence halls for that."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?

"Yes, I will be honest. I don't think too many people can say they haven't. You always glance at your neighbor's."

REELING 'EM IN

Warm weather brings new life to fishing scene

By JJ Duncan

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's a perfect spring evening and the banks of Rocky Ford are lined with coolers, tackle boxes the size of mini fridges and little red and white bobbers sitting about 20 feet out in the water.

The crowd, mostly men of various ages in old T-shirts, isn't catching much.

In a blue fleece jacket with nothing but a fly rod and a small black pack slung around his shoulder, Daniel Schapaugh, senior in fisheries biology, stands out. He's catching fish left and right.

He shakes his head as he looks at one large lure being reeled in from the water.

"People's biggest mistake they make is that they use lures that are too big," he said. "It selects you out because you can't catch some of the smaller ones. And just because you use a bigger lure doesn't mean you're going to catch bigger fish."

Soon after, Schapaugh pulls in a 1.5 pound white bass that bit on his small fly, tied to resemble a minnow. It's the only one he keeps today though some are larger.

"It's smaller, and a little beat up," he says and points to a couple of marks on the fish. "You can see it here and here. Looks like someone snagged it."

Schapaugh has been fishing since he started going out with his dad, just like most people who make a hobby out of their rods and reels. His brother, Adam, shares his fisheries and biology major, and the two sometimes fish together with Schapaugh's fiancée, Melissa Wohler senior in microbiology.

Not only does he go out whenever he can, but Schapaugh, who works at Pathfinder, also teaches people to fly fish since he became one of only five certified instructors in the state. The test was administered by the Federation of Fly Fishers in Mountain Home, Ark., the closest testing site available, and only three of the 11 in Schapaugh's class passed, he said.

The test requires excellent accuracy. In order to hit a rock about 15 yards out, Schapaugh whipped his rod back in a U shape and laid the fly down next to the rock to avoid a snag.

Keith Guido, assistant professor of biology, specializing in fish ecology, said he would hate to go up against Schapaugh in a contest. He said that to be a good angler, people must know what the optimal conditions are for the fish they want to catch and know how to fish for a specific target.

But Guido speculated that the bustling spring fishing crowds were due to more than the fact that white bass spawn this time of year.

"Some of it is likely from socio-economic influ-

Casting into the water at the Rocky Ford fishing area, Daniel Schapaugh, senior in fisheries and wildlife biology, uses his fly fishing pole with lures he built.

ences," he said. "It's getting nice out, and people are just ready to get out and go fishing."

Ben Dickey, senior in illustration, said that when summer arrives, he can always be found at the water's edge.

"Once school is out, I'm not around much," he said. "I'm fishing all the time. I'll grab a six-pack of beer, and I'm gone."

Dickey, who is also the lead singer for metal band Pins & Needles, has been nabbing fish from the private farm ponds on his dad's land in Wabaunsee, Kan., since the weather started to warm up. Dickey said he uses a more traditional rod and spin reel.

"I use rubber worms and the bass eat them up," he said. "They love it. In the summertime, I'll use hula poppers because they're topwater lures, and the fish come up to bite them."

Fishing in private ponds, Dickey said it's important to think about conserving the quality of the population.

"In the spring, I'll throw fish back because they're spawning, and I don't like to take them out of the farm ponds," he said. "In a small pond like that, you have to be aware of conservation. I always throw the big fish back because you need that strong gene in the pond."

Catch and release can be an effective means of ecology conservation, but Guido warned that fish that have been caught often die soon after, especially if they aren't handled carefully.

Schapaugh said there were a few techniques that help in keeping the fish you release alive.

"Use barbless hooks so I don't have to tear the fish apart to get the hook," he said. "And the quicker you can land the fish the better, so you don't get them totally worn out."

After catching one large fish, Schapaugh held it in the water while it got more active.

"It's good if you can revive a tired fish," he said. "Also handle them as little as you can, and get them back in the water as fast as you can without touching their gills."

Schapaugh said releasing fish helps fish ecology, rescued from over fishing.

For him, fishing involves more than just getting in a site and angling out some bass. Schapaugh also ties his own flies and made his rod from component pieces he chose. While he teaches casting lessons, he said many people are also interested in learning to tie flies.

"It keeps me busy during the winter," he said. "I mainly use feathers or deer hair."

When it comes to actually eating the fish, it's usually best to avoid bottom-feeding fish such as catfish, carp and drums. However, fish such as crappie, white bass and walleye are fine for eating, said Schapaugh, who cleans the fish before heading home.

For the best advice in catching that elusive dinner, Dickey said to look for the fishing veterans and ask them how to do things.

"There's a lot of good old-timers who know how to fish, and they don't mess around," he said. "If an old guy tells you to try something, try it. Don't just blow him off. Those old dudes at Tuttle know what they're doing."

It's important to remember to get a license before you catch spring fever and head out to the tackle shop too, he said.

Dickey said he didn't need one for the private ponds he uses, but he once tried to get away without one at a public fishing spot.

"I got busted without having a fishing license once," he said. "I got a fat ticket. I thought I'd get away with it, but they'll catch you."

While Dickey said he uses fishing simply as a way to relax and have fun with friends, Schapaugh said he's looking to make a career out of his passion.

Most of the people in my major will probably go on to work for the government in wildlife and parks, but I want to be a guide maybe around New Mexico and Colorado," he said.

But with beer and friends, alone, he Dickey is likely with the majority of local fly fishers.

"I've been fishing my whole life, and I'd rather do that than just about anything else," he said. "All my friends fish. We can all get together and not hang. We spend all night catching something."

My dad fishes a lot, my girlfriend fishes a lot, my water fishes a lot. You'd be surprised how many people fish and say they want to go out with me.

Schapaugh pulls in the fishing line with his hand after casting into the water under Milford dam. He said he only uses the reel when pulling in large fish.

Schapaugh works to pull a fish out of water while using his fly fishing pole at the Milford Lake area. Schapaugh said he goes fly fishing every week.

Bush calls for peace in Israel, Palestine

"Road map" envisions Palestinian state by '05

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Announcing formal delivery of a Mideast peace plan written by international mediators, President Bush called on Israelis and Palestinians to "immediately end the violence and return to a path of peace."

The so-called "road map" plan, devised by the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia, envisions a Palestinian state by 2005.

"The road map represents a starting point toward achieving the vision of two states — a secure state of Israel and a viable, peaceful, democratic Palestine," Bush said in a statement read by his press secretary, Ari Fleischer.

"It is a framework for progress toward lasting peace and security in the Middle East."

Bush said the success of the plan depends on "the good-faith efforts and contributions of both sides" and pressed Israelis and Palestinians to work "above all, directly with each other."

"An opportunity now exists to move forward," he said.

Secretary of State Colin Powell, meanwhile, conferred by telephone Wednesday with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon of Israel and Mahmoud Abbas, Legislators to debate tax plan

Bill would help schools, stabilize state budget

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the Kansas House of Representatives are expected to debate a bill today that would increase aid to public schools and balance the state's budget deficit by raising taxes — something Gov. Kathleen Sebelius and Republican leaders have avoided since the legislative session began.

Sixteen freshmen legislators proposed the plan Tuesday, suggesting a half-percent sales tax increase and a 3.5 percent income tax surcharge, beginning June 1.

The proposal also would postpone previously scheduled reductions in the sales tax, set to decrease the tax from 5.3 percent to 5 percent.

Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, who helped draft the budget-balancing plan, said the proposal differs from other efforts in the Legislature to expand gambling and delay tax refunds.

"We're not putting off the inevitability of tax increases," she said.

Such increases would begin July 1 and yield about $267 million — including $16.3 million earmarked for Sussanna Tanus is greeted by her husband, Arturo Tanus, as she and her sons, Omar, 8, and Karim, 10, pick up Arturo at the end of the day at Call Hall. Arturo is working on getting his doctorate in food science as well as being a graduate research assistant in food microbiology for the Department of Animal Science and Industry's Food Science Institute.

International students' spouses face challenges

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

She didn't want to come to Manhattan.

It meant leaving family and friends in Mexico. It meant a whole new lifestyle. And a lot of obstacles.

But Sussanna Tanus also knew it was a great opportunity for her husband and her two young children.

Sussanna's husband, Arturo, is a graduate student in food science at K-State.

He moved his family from Monterey, Mexico, two years ago to pursue his doctorate.

Sussanna didn't know English. Neither did their two children.

"It was very scary to come here," she said. "Everything was different than what I knew. It was hard sometimes."

Sussanna isn't alone. Many graduate students move to Manhattan from another country to pursue their educations. Some of them bring families.

While Arturo has a visa that allows him to work and study in the United States, Sussanna doesn't.

Her visa allows her to be in the United States, but she isn't allowed to work or study.

Sussanna admits it's sometimes a lonely lifestyle, but in general, she is happy.

"One of the hardest things is your social life is gone. When you get here, you can meet other couples. You just have to try to stay involved," she said.

"It makes this whole transition and life easier."

One way that Sussanna tries to make her stay in Manhattan easier is through a community organization called World

Sussanna Tanus meets her sons Omar, 8, and Karim, 10, as they get home from school and examines a piece of artwork Omar made. Sussanna is one of many spouses of international students who have to adjust to living away from their native country.

Friendship.

World Friendship is a nonreligious organization established for American and international women of Manhattan. Members have the opportunity to make new friends, improve their English, develop creative skills and share different cultures.

"It is very important to me. I meet other women from different cultures in similar situations," Sussanna said. "It makes me not feel so alone."

Joan Froelich, president of World Friendship, said the organization is important because there are so many women in Manhattan who don't know other women and who don't fully understand the way of life in America.

"We try to help them better understand the ways of our country, yet we want to understand their ways too," Froelich said.

Developing a social circle and developing skills she didn't have when they moved here has made life easier for Sussanna.

"Everything is new and different," she said. "But after some time here, it is nice. I feel free, and I like that."

Learning a new language, leaving friends and getting used to a new culture haven't been easy. And money is sometimes tight, since only Arturo is allowed to work.

But the Tanus family knows they made the right decision by coming to Manhattan. The Tanuses know they will be better off when they leave here than they were when they came.

"We have sacrificed, but it's all for the family, especially my kids," Arturo said.

"I don't want to deprive them of all there is to offer in the United States. They can develop much better, and we will all benefit."

Volunteers help children with homework, provide guidance

Regena Banks started as a parent volunteer at the Boys and Girls Club of Manhattan seven years ago.

"At first, I thought I could never work here because it's too loud," Banks, area unit director, said. "But I started because of the kids, and they're why I'm still here."

The Boys and Girls Club is an after-school program where kids can have a safe, positive place to go, Banks said. About 550 K-State students volunteer with the organization.

Sometimes, volunteers will only come one time, and other times — like those involved in the America Reads Program — will come weekly, Banks said.

Graduate student trains for Olympic team

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Roberto Carvajal has dreamed of competing in the Olympics since he could walk. Next summer, he might have his chance. Carvajal, graduate student in manufacturing systems engineering, trains about 20 hours each week, hoping for a spot on the Mexican national track team and a chance to compete in the 2004 Olympic games in Athens, Greece. Carvajal, originally from Chihuahua, Mexico, ran for K-State's track team for three years, until spring 2002. Since then, he has competed in national and international meets, representing Chihuahua in the 400 meter hurdles and the men's 4 x 400 meter relay. "If you are a student in the university, you compete in the NCAA track and field," he said. "And if you have the time, you go to the national track and field championships." He also is training for the World Championship in August, after competing there in 2001 in the 4 x 400 meter relay. "It's insane," he said. "We ran the Mexican national record and still didn't make the finals, if that tells you anything." Carvajal finished in third-place in the November 2002 Central American and Caribbean Games. However, he needs to shave one second off his time to qualify for preliminary meets. "In the 400 meter hurdles, my best time is not good enough to go to the Olympic games," Carvajal said. "In anything else, a second wouldn't be that much. But here, it's quite a bit." He said he has until June 2004 to improve his time. "I'm hoping with another year and a half of training and a little maturing, I can chop that second off my time," he said.

Workers serve campus' ice cream

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

She might not end up scooping ice cream for the rest of her life, but for now, it's a good job. Erika Bowser, sophomore in agricultural communications, said she has served Call Hall's ice cream since August.

"It was kind of a fluke how I got the job," she said. "I needed a job, and I looked all over campus."

Bowser applied at Call Hall and said the manager called her almost immediately.

Her duties consist of scooping ice cream, ringing up customers' purchases, cutting cheese and stocking products such as ice cream and milk.

"I also deliver to various businesses around Manhattan," she said.

Bowser said she likes the job because there are many advantages, but one disadvantage is the minimum-wage pay, she said.

"But it's a low-stress job. I can work when I want," she said. "If I need a day off, I can usually get it off."

She said she works about 20 hours each week.

"I work between my classes, and I close every night of the week," she said. "It is very convenient to work on campus. I can just walk to work between my classes."

Bowser said her coworkers are another advantage of the job.

"The people I work with are really great," she said. "And not everybody can get free ice cream every day."

Renee Westgate, manager of the ice cream shop, said she also likes the employees.

"I really enjoy the people I work with," she said. "And I get to meet a bunch of new people all the time."

Westgate said new customers are always coming in to try the ice cream.

"We see a lot of people that have heard about the ice cream and stop in," she said. "Some drive pretty far to get it. We have people come from Topeka."

Westgate said the most popular flavor people come in for is a common one.

"We have about 42 different flavors, but the most we sell is vanilla," she said. "As far as chocolate goes, we sell a lot of Swiss chocolate almond."

The shop's profits pay for equipment and for research and development.

Call Hall sells many other products besides ice cream, Westgate said.

"We also sell milk, butter, eggs and cheese from here," she said. "They're all K-State products."

Flint Hills Breadbasket seeks project donations

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan classrooms aren't the only empty things during the summer.

When summer vacation clears out area students, the Flint Hills Breadbasket finds its shelves empty as well.

As a result, the Breadbasket came up with Project Manhattan, a program developed eight years ago to restock the Breadbasket's shelves during the summer months.

"Lots of time the kids are not in school, and families have to put more meals on the table, so this helps to get needed food items," said Mindy Elsline, assistant director of the Breadbasket.

Project Manhattan takes place during the month of May, with several businesses and individuals throughout the community collecting food items. During the first week of June, the Breadbasket will collect all items to stock the shelves and distribute to families in need.

"Most of the time, businesses get together with their employees and designate one of the food items on the list to collect," Elsline said. "They take it upon themselves to get different ideas. Lots of times they'll challenge another business, but it's mainly done with employees at the business."

Sharing the wealth

Businesses, organizations and individuals interested in donating food items to Project Manhattan can contact the Flint Hills Breadbasket at 537-0730. Food donations can be dropped off at the Breadbasket office, 905 Yuma St., from 8:30 a.m. to noon and 1 to 4 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Businesses involved in the project this year include Briggs Auto Group, It's Greek to Me, and several K-State faculty and student groups, among others.

Kathy Lindsay, human resources manager for It's Greek to Me, said the business decided to participate in the Project Manhattan food drive a number of years ago.

"We have been doing this for several years because we want to give back to the community," she said.

Lindsay said that while the food drive does not benefit their business, it might contribute to some employees.

"It's nice to give back to the community. They've given us so much, and we have so many people who work here, some who may use the Breadbasket, and it's nice to know it's been used," she said.

"It's a really good program, and I'm impressed that so many businesses want to participate," she said. "Without them, I don't know what we would do in the summer."

TO THE POINT New peace plan has potential to stifle conflict

The Mideast peace plan announced today is finally a plan with credibility and the possibility of creating change in the region of conflict.

The plan, sponsored by the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia, has the legitimacy of international support. It would create a Palestinian state by 2005.

It is refreshing to see a plan with actual deadlines and the backing of the global community.

Both Israel and Palestine should approach the plan with renewed motivation to restore peace and recognize the great opportunity they have been given. It is time to realize that suicide bombings and continuous gunfire are only stalling the chance for a better life.

The United States as the leading nation, however, must put its own economic interests aside and work toward peace alone.

Although we approach this plan and new leadership in the region with some skepticism, there is hope these changes will help to reinvigorate the peace process and move it from its decades-long standstill.

DEBATING DIETS

Vegetarian meals healthier, better for the ecosystem

The original actor who played Ronald McDonald in McDonald's TV commercials is now a vegetarian.

Yes, our favorite clown who kept the Hamburger away from those tasty burgers dripping with fatty goodness.

I wonder what he saw. Or maybe he just thought about the implications of eating their mass-produced poor excuses for beef patties.

Many hamburgers are processed into the thin, sponge-like patties that can be enjoyed by the average American, providing them some protein and a variety of chemicals. Avoiding this type of meat and all-meat products is a good alternative to today's processed, who-knows-what-is-in-it meat.

In his Time Magazine article, Richard Corliss points out what vegetarianism diets are about.

"Vegetarianism should be about more than not eating. It's also about smart eating," he said.

With this basis, it is easy to understand why being a vegetarian is a healthy and beneficial diet, as long as it is followed faithfully.

The reasons behind being a vegetarian are simple yet vary among the different types of vegetarian diets.

Vegans believe that using any animal product is ethically wrong. They restrict all animal products, including dairy and eggs, from their diets. Their diets can be successful and healthful with careful planning.

For some vegetarians, just thinking about what is being consumed is enough for them to shun meat from their diet. Compassion for animals' lives is important in a world where humans are so arrogant that they don't consider life beyond their own.

Animals are not reproducing fast enough for humans to consume them as much as we do. Instead, we breed, feed and kill them for our own selfish reasons, simply because we think they taste good.

Another consideration is how to best use the earth's natural resources. By eating only what the earth produces naturally, it is not exploited by the large industries used to process and produce the animal products that Americans use and export.

The most common reason is the treatment of the animals that are raised to be slaughtered. The living conditions alone are disgusting enough to boycott meat producers, forcing them to slow production.

The lives of dedicated vegetarians are healthier due to the decrease in fatty foods and the benefits of plant foods in general. Registered dietitian Johanna Dwyer of Tufts University Medical School and the New England Medical Center Hospital, Boston, reported many health benefits for individuals on plant food diets in an FDA Consumer Magazine article.

"Data are strong that vegetarians are at a lesser risk for obesity, atonic [reduced muscle tone] constipation, lung cancer and alcoholism. Evidence is good that risks for hypertension, coronary artery disease, type II diabetes and gallstones are lower," she said.

Caring for the earth and for your own health is what a vegetarian lifestyle promotes. Plant foods also are cheaper than animal foods. In addition, the taste and texture can be mimicked convincingly in products like tofu.

Restricting your diet to that of a vegetarian reduces the amount of B-12 and proteins if it isn't properly arranged. But supplements, soy protein, vegetables and a variety of grains, legumes, seeds and nuts can account for all that is missing from a diet based around meat products.

These products are essentially unnecessary in human's diets and people that have chosen the vegetarian lifestyle are benefiting from the absence of them.

Meat a tasty, natural part of human diets

Before the real debate begins, I would just like to pause a moment and reflect on the wondrous world of meat.

There are so many different kinds of meat, and the variations in preparation are endless. There's cow meat, chicken meat, turkey meat, buffalo meat, ostrich meat, alligator meat, squid meat, crab meat, cat meat, snake meat, rabbit meat, pig meat – and you thought Forrest Gump could go on about shrimp. Which reminds me – shrimp meat, lamb meat, deer meat, horse meat, dog meat, fish meat. Mmm, all so good and tasty.

It's beyond me why people have any reservations about eating meat, but they seem to come up with plenty of excuses. Some claim political, economical, religious, moral or personal health concerns as their motivation, but these fail to convince me.

First, I will grant amnesty for people who refrain from eating meat for religious reasons. However, religious reasons are not to be confused with moral reasons. Moral reasons will receive no such grace on my part, but rather the most scrutiny of all. Excuses like "Cows have feelings, too" and "It's wrong to eat the flesh of another living creature" are among my list of the lamest reasons in the world.

I am not a heartless barbarian who kills and devours every moving thing in sight to satisfy my appetite. But honestly, animals are for eating – either by other animals or by humans.

Sure, they serve other purposes too, like using their skin for clothing and their waste for manure, but they are part of the food chain. Think "Lion King" – the great circle of life. Humans are part of that food chain, and us eating meat is no different from them eating each other.

I do, however, wish to clarify that I am defending the consumption of meat on the basis that it's a natural portion of our diet. Things like injecting wads of hormones into chicken and cows so they fatten up to the point that they can't walk would not be natural.

Being a vegetarian because you object to these practices is a valid reason in my book, though not completely necessary. There are other alternatives; buying only free-range chickens at organic or natural food markets is one way of eating meat with a guilt-free conscious.

Americans are known as meat-eating, meat-loving people. They consumed 49.6 kilograms per capita of poultry meat in 2001, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

It has been suggested that this statistic is in direct relation to the increase in obesity, heart disease, and so many other bad things.

Vegetarians show a significantly lower rate of having such health concerns, according to healthnotes.com. But being healthy and being vegetarian are not mutually inclusive.

You can be an unhealthy vegetarian, or you can be a healthy meat-eater. Cutting meat from your diet entirely is not necessary to be healthy.

Being healthy is, as in most all cases, a matter of moderation. According to the USDA, a person only needs two to three servings of meat per day in two- to three-ounce servings.

Other suggestions: Choose lean meat, poultry without skin, fish, and dry beans and peas often – they are the choices lowest in fat; trim away all the fat you can see, and broil, roast or boil these foods instead of frying them.

If health concerns are a top priority in food consumption, then cutting back on portion size and altering preparation methods of meat can be just as beneficial as eliminating meat altogether.

But if, for whatever reason, a person does opt for vegetarianism, well, that just leaves more meat for me.

Direct Deposit Month to raise awareness of banking option

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Direct deposit was created to make life easier.

But some choose not to use it, even when it's available, said Patsy Havenstein, assistant director of payroll at K-State.

She said May - Direct Deposit Month - would be a good time to increase awareness of the benefits of direct deposits. Direct deposit is available to all students, faculty and staff at K-State, but the student employees lag behind in participation, she said.

"In a recent study, it was determined only 60 percent of student employees have their paychecks electronically deposited into their bank accounts," she said. "This is in comparison to 90 percent for K-State faculty and staff."

Havenstein said she would have expected overall percentages to be higher but especially for students.

"I can't imagine why anybody would wait in line at the bank if they didn't have to," she said.

"This raises concerns that many of our employees aren't aware that this opportunity exists, especially student employees."

Kyle Level, customer

Direct deposit

Advantages of direct deposit

- Convenience
- Availability of funds
- Less margin for mistakes/fraud
- No worry about lost checks
- No trips to the bank
- Pay stub is mailed to home
- Can use hometown bank

-Source: Patsy Havenstein, assistant director of payroll at K-State

Direct deposit statistics

The chance of having a problem with check is 20 times greater than that of a direct deposit.

- 71 percent of employees with direct deposit available to them use it.
- 80 percent of companies with 100 or more employees use direct deposit.

-Source: DirectDeposit.org

■ To sign up for direct deposit, go to ksu.edu/hr/forms.

service representative for Capitol Federal Savings in Manhattan, said roughly half of its customers take advantage of direct deposit.

"People choose to use it because of convenience, and funds are usually available about one day earlier," he said.

"Some don't use it because old habits are hard to break - they have always picked up a check and deposited it, and they are not willing to have it done electronically."

Capitol Federal encourages its customers to use direct deposit when it's available, Level said.

"There are fewer chances for mistakes, fraudulent activity or just losing a check," he said.

Havenstein said that since the end of the semester is near, it is important for student employees to communicate with supervisors or Human Resources if they are moving or closing accounts.

"This is important to ensure they get their final paycheck timely, as well as providing us a better chance of getting their W-2 to the correct address," she said.

At the beginning of fiscal year 2004, the state, excluding Kansas Board of Regents institutions, like K-State, will change the way direct deposit is conducted for those participating, Havenstein said.

"The state of Kansas, excluding Regents Institution employees, will stop mailing paycheck stubs with the new fiscal year at a savings of $500,000 in printing and postage savings," she said.

Though discussion of this at the university level has begun, no decisions have been made, Havenstein said.

"If it were to go into effect, the savings for the university would be $70,000," she said.

Fraternities present Sunset Revival music festival in honor of alumnus

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten hours of local music will be available Saturday on the front lawn of the Sigma Nu fraternity house as part of the Sunset Revival music festival.

The concert is a joint effort that will be catered by Sigma Nu and Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternities. Sig Ep social chairman Scott Schnabel said. The fraternities will be selling food, drinks and T-shirts.

Gang of Hours, Lucky Joan, Ten Til' Blue, Tripwire and headliner Sun Cured Red are slated to perform at the revival.

Sun Cured Red first played the revival last year.

Jimmy Stapp, guitar player for Sun Cured Red, said the band's experience playing the revival last year was fun.

"The yard is like a big outdoor amphitheater, and they had food and vendors out there," he said. "In that respect, it was almost like a mini-festival."

"Overall, I think it is very cool that the fraternity offers this type of opportunity not only to the college kids, but to the bands as well."

The Sunset Revival has its roots in the early 1990s, but it was revived three years ago.

"It's a tradition that went on for a while during the early '90s, which fell by the wayside and didn't happen again until three years ago," said Jason Beahm, Sigma Nu member in charge of the event.

Sigma Nu alumnus Todd Beasley recently passed away from a rare lung disease, and Beahm said a portion of the proceeds from the concert will be used to start a scholarship in the name of Beasley's son, Tate.

Beahm said getting people together to have fun and listen to music, and to add to the few music festivals in Manhattan, were his reasons for getting involved with the revival.

"Something like this interested me because it was an opportunity for fun in Manhattan," he said. "We just wanted to do a good job putting on something so that everyone will relax and have a fun day," he said.

Stapp said the local rock experience is why the revival is worth the $5 entry fee.

"People should come out because it will offer them an opportunity to see some great live original music from some bands they may never have heard before," he said.

One of the lessons Beahm has learned is communication is the key to planning something like the Sunset Revival.

"There are so many rules and restrictions that we were worried this was too hard," he said. "When we made sure we followed the rules, everyone was very supportive."

Schnabel said the show will go on regardless of possible spring showers.

"We'll set up some tarps so the bands can keep playing," he said. "If people want to wait it out and stand in the rain, it might delay the show for a couple of hours, but rain won't stop the show."

Medical MD & Veterinary Degree Programs
Making World-Class Physicians & Veterinarians Today, For Tomorrow's World
■ Programs to meet the needs of high school and college graduates.
■ More than a half century old well-recognized and established European medical and veterinary universities.
■ Programs recognized by the National Committee on Medical Education, Accreditation, and the U.S. Department of Education.
■ 100% financial aid is available. The U.S. government provides subsidized loans to qualified students in our programs.
■ Approved by New York Medical Education Board for clinical training in the state of New York. (A state with a high number of residency positions.)
■ Medical and veterinary clinical clerkships/training in the USA.
■ Smaller class size with traditional European tutorial style education.
■ Programs offer opportunity to earn dual degrees - MD PhD, MD MBA, MD MSHA, MD MPH, etc.
■ Much safer campus environment, compared to many campuses in the USA, allowing retaining and strengthening of cultural identities.
■ English language curriculum matches to major American medical and veterinary schools.
■ An excellent opportunity for hands-on participation for extensive training and experience.
■ Alumni holding very good positions all over the USA.
When it comes to medical & veterinary education, our programs set standards for excellence. With cooperation from European universities, Hope Medical Institute brings you a unique, unmatched opportunity at your doorstep.

K-State sports will improve in next season

Columnist will critique sports teams from afar

Two weeks. That's all that stands in the way between my degree from the College of Education and me. Yes, it's probably difficult for all of my critics at KU, Nebraska and USC to believe, but I actually will be teaching and coaching next fall.

These measly two weeks also are all that is left of the 2002-03 school year. That's very hard to believe.

It seems like it was August yesterday and the Cats were getting ready to open the 2002 gridiron campaign against Western Kentucky.

I can remember getting excited in November for Deb Patterson's and Jim Wooldridge's hoopsters to kickoff their seasons.

And I also was looking forward this year to catching some K-State baseball under the new lights.

But alas, my senior year and all of the K-State sports highlights are nearly finished for this year.

High hopes abound in many different aspects of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics in the coming year. Literally, the table is set for a great campaign.

So it only is natural to look ahead to all the good things that could take place for the Cats in the 2003-04 school year in, specifically, three main sports.

We are pretty lucky here in Wildcat country when it comes to football.

We have the shortest wait of any NCAA Division-I football fans. Only 113 summer days of watching the American League Central Division leading Kansas City Royals until the season begins.

Aug. 23, 2003, will be the day the Cats' long march to the Sugar Bowl begins.

Not only will the game feature a Cal squad that went 7-5 last year, but a K-State team with two preseason Heisman Trophy candidates.

If you were one of the more than 12,000 to attend the spring game, you got to witness more than 400 yards of offense from the No. 1s. Although the game didn't have much in the way of highlights, a glimpse of next year's team was given.

If you're a gambler, Las Vegas is giving 8-1 odds for a K-State National Championship.

That's pretty impressive considering Vegas is giving Iowa State 300-1 odds to win the Sugar Bowl.

You would have to be as drunk as Larry Eustachy to take odds like that.

The expectations for Wooldridge's incoming freshman and Junior College men's basketball recruiting class are high too. Hopefully, the two Texas blue chippers, along with the others, can propel the Cats into the postseason. And with a changing of the coaching guard in Lawrence, the time is ripe for KU's winning streak that dates back to my toddlerhood to end.

Patterson returns all five starters off a women's basketball team that won 29 games last year but fell in the second round of the NCAA Tournament. It will, of course, be the Associated Press, Kodak and U.S. Basketball Writers Association, first-team All-American as well as Big 12 Player of the Year, Nicole Ohlde's senior year. This campaign should be K-State's best yet.

Looking ahead to the 2003-04 school year, I can't help but envy the students who will be on campus next year. I have a feeling you will be in for a treat next year.

Just like all the students who will have the pleasure of being taught by me next year.

NATIONAL SPOTLIGHT

Equestrian to compete at IHSA National Championships

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The time has finally come.

After weeks of preparation, the K-State Western and English teams will compete for the first time at the IHSA National Championships from Friday through Sunday in Murfreesboro, Tenn.

"We're obviously pretty excited," Coach Meghan Cunningham said. "We've worked really hard to get to where we are, and now we're ready to show."

Competition begins at 8:30 a.m. Friday at the Tennessee Miller Coliseum. Events begin at 8 a.m. Saturday and Sunday.

While K-State has had numerous wins in its third year as a varsity sport, nationals remains the ultimate prize.

IHSA National Equestrian Championships

Western Team

Katrina Myers (beginner)
Lauren Allen (intermediate)
Kristin Tanney (advanced)
Amanda Gigot (open reining)
Erin Peery (open horseman ship)

Western Individuals

Brandi Vogel (open reining, open horseman ship)
Elaine Cobb (intermediate)
Amanda Gigot (AQHA High-Point Rider)

English Team

Jenae Grossart (novice flat)
Summer Hamil (novice fences)
Anne Brammeier (walk/trot)
Natalie Poholsky (walk/trot/canter)
Natalie Bennett (intermediate flat)
Lauren Demmel (intermediate fences)
Allison Woodworth (open fences and open flat)

English Individuals

Julie Hufft (walk/trot/canter)
Jessica Gittleman (walk/trot/canter)
Allison Woodworth (USAE/Cacchione Cup)

open reining and open horseman ship.

"Hopefully, my postseason consistency will pay off," Vogel said. "I've been lucky to have really good draws, and everything falls into place after that."

Gigot will compete for the AQHA High-Point Rider against each region's top Western rider. Sophomore Allison Woodworth will compete against 26

"I don't see how we can be any more ready for this," senior Amanda Gigot said.

"We've worked on everything we knew we needed to work on. We're as ready as we're going to be."

In addition to the Western and English teams, four individuals will compete for IHSA crowns with two others competing for individual High-Point Rider championships.

English riders Julie Hufft and Jessica Gittleman swept the top two spots in walk/trot/canter at zones, sending both in pursuit of their first national titles. Western rider Elaine Cobb was second at zones and will compete at nationals in open horseman ship.

Brandi Vogel, a junior from Lenexa, Kan., won K-State's first national title last season in advanced horseman ship.

Vogel also was K-State's lone winner at the Varsity Championships on April 18, winning for the sixth time this season. She'll have the chance to add two IHSA titles to her résumé in others for the English equivalent, the USAE/Cacchione Cup.

"I'm trying not to think about it," Woodworth said. "When I get there, I'll be nervous enough."

While Woodworth said team championships are the top priority, equestrian is one sport where individual success breeds team success.

"We have very strong individuals," Woodworth said, "and we need them to place high to be successful as a team."

Regular season success was common for the Wildcats, but Gigot said the Varsity Championships taught them some lessons they will take to Tennessee.

"I got a real wake-up call at how good the competition is going to be," Gigot said.

"We've known we're going to have stiff competition, but going down there and actually seeing them showed us what we need to work on."

With riders booking extra practices the last two weeks, fine-tuning has sharpened the Cats' riding to a sharp edge. Now, they're itching to compete.

"We've eliminated all the little errors we've made in the last few shows," Gigot said.

K-State will return to the NCAA Tennis Tournament this year when it faces Northwestern at 10 a.m. May 10 in Evanston, Ill.

"It's been a really tough year in the Big 12, and the fact that we got eight teams in tells you how strong our conference is."

"I feel great," Coach Steve Bietau said. "I think it's a tremendous honor for our team and our coaches. It's been a really tough year in the Big 12, and the fact that we got eight teams in tells you how strong our conference is."

"We've had to face that tough conference all year, and now is when you get rewarded for it."

The tournament, which only ranks the top 16 teams, places three teams in a bracket along with a ranked one. The Cats are the No. 3 seed in their bracket, which also features No. 1 seed VCU and No. 4 seed Illinois State. VCU received an overall tournament ranking of No. 12.

Petra Sedlmajerova returns a serve to Texas A&M's Jessica Roland at the Washburn Tennis Facility earlier this season. Sedlmajerova and doubles partner Paulina Castillejos were named All-Big 12 selections Tuesday, and K-State was tagged with a No. 3 seed in the NCAA Tournament on Wednesday.

K-State last made it to the NCAA Tournament in 1998 when it lost 5-3 to New Mexico in the first round.

Bietau said he is looking forward to the competition his team faces against Northwestern.

"We know they're a very good team," Bietau said.

"They're probably one of the tougher No. 2 seeds in the tournament. We know it's going to be a good challenge for us." News of the NCAA berth came just one day after two Wildcat netters were named to the Big 12 All-Conference Team.

Senior Petra Sedlmajerova received her third-straight individual All-Big 12 honor, as well as her first doubles nomination along with teammate Paulina Castillejos.

It was Castillejos' first All-Big 12 honor.

NHL | League announces award finalists

Avalanche forward Peter Forsberg, Canucks forward Markus Naslund and Devils goaltender Martin Brodeur were selected as finalists Wednesday for the Hart Trophy, given to the NHL's most valuable player.

All are MVP finalists for the first time. Brodeur also is a finalist for the Vezina Trophy as top goaltender, along with Marty Turco of the Stars and Ed Belfour of the Maple Leafs.

Olympics | Officials say USOC was right

The U.S. Olympic Committee was right to clear Carl Lewis and other Americans after positive drug tests in 1988, track and field's world governing body ruled Wednesday.

The USOC followed the rules in dealing with eight positive cases for stimulants at the 1988 Olympic trials, the International Association of Athletics Federations said.

According to documents released by Dr. Wade Exum, the USOC's former director for drug control, U.S. athletes tested positive for drugs more than 100 times from 1988 to 2000. Only a handful were barred from competing and 19 went on to win medals.

College basketball | Ford decision soon

According to newspaper and broadcast reports, Texas' All-American point guard T.J. Ford is expected to announce this week, possibly Thursday, that he'll make himself available for the NBA draft June 26, where he's projected as a lottery pick.

"He has to go," the Fort Worth Star-Telegram quoted an anonymous team source as saying in Wednesday's editions. "He's going to be a top-10 pick. After the season he's had, he could only hurt (his standing) by staying another year."

College basketball | Weber in at Illinois

Bruce Weber confirmed he will be the new basketball coach at Illinois after guiding Southern Illinois to NCAA tournament appearances the past two seasons.

"Yes," Weber responded Tuesday night when asked if he is taking the Illinois job. He declined to say anything more to a reporter and closed the door to his rural Carbondale home.

MLB | Bonds homers twice

Barry Bonds homered twice in San Francisco's game against the Chicago Cubs on Wednesday night, giving him 621 career home runs.

It was Bonds' first multihomer game of the season and 62nd of his career, tying him with Hank Aaron for fourth on the all-time list. Babe Ruth (72), Mark McGwire (67) and Willie Mays (63) are ahead of them.

College basketball | Eustachy suspended

Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy was suspended Wednesday after acknowledging he is an alcoholic, and the athletic director urged the school to fire him.

Three hours after Eustachy said he has sought treatment but will not resign, athletic director Bruce Van De Velde held a news conference of his own to announce that Eustachy would be suspended with pay and should be replaced.

A STARRY NIGHT'S RETREAT

Camping provides break from daily routine, entertainment

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Stick to the basics: a sleeping bag, some food and possibly a fishing pole. Leave the curling iron, microwave and air conditioning behind. It's time to ditch the comforts of modern technology and go camping.

"We had a friend who had never been camping before, and we really wanted to take her," Meghann Kueck, freshman in elementary education, said. "She said if she couldn't bring any makeup, then she wasn't going. We talked her down to lip gloss and mascara."

There are those who camp and those who don't, and the difference is obvious, Kueck said.

Kueck is among those who camp. She has her eight-person tent rolled up in the corner of her residence hall room. Kueck said she has yet to go camping this season but takes the occasional drive to Tuttle Creek State Park to "get away from town."

"My friends and I planned on going camping a lot, but it never worked out — just conflicting schedules or the weather not cooperating," Kueck said.

With the weather warming up, Tuttle Creek has been about half full of campers for the past month, said Todd Lovin, Tuttle Creek State Park manager.

"It's just a great time to get out and get away from things," Lovin said. "It's still by far one of the cheapest forms of recreation."

Tuttle Creek does get a fair amount of college students, Lovin said, but he said he would like to see a lot more.

"Typically, college students like the more primitive areas along the east side, in the spillway area. They probably find it more attractive, a little more of nature and getting away a little more," Lovin said.

"We see a little more inexperienced campers for college students. They just need to check the regulations beforehand and have fun," he said.

Luke Schooler, freshman in horticulture, said he has had the opportunity to take advantage of the warmer weather and take to the great outdoors. About a month ago, he and a friend went camping and fishing at the Ozarks in Missouri, he said. Usually, though, the camping takes place at a friend's pasture, either around Manhattan or his hometown.

Along with fishing being an important aspect of camping, Schooler said the bonfire is an essential part. The bonfire seems to set the right atmosphere for conversations and bonding, Kueck said.

"There's fewer distractions, and you have better conversations then. Usually, you don't just sit down with your friends and talk a lot. You'll watch a movie or something," Kueck said. "But out there, there's nothing much to do but talk, so you get to know people a lot better."

Kueck said her conversations with her friends usually concern philosophical issues, such as religion, the future and the meaning of life. Schooler, on the other hand, said his conversations are more of the weird, goofy side.

"We talk about girls, remember what we've done in the past," he said. "Sometimes, someone brings a guitar or a banjo, and we listen to music."

Bonding, particularly male bonding, is conducive to camping, he said.

Kyle Baack, freshman in music education, said he had the same experience camping with his fellow Boy Scouts on intense canoe trips or just with his friends for a weekend.

"You definitely bond, whether you mean to or not. You just feed off each other," Baack said. "When you have to work together, you get to know each other and trust each other."

The bonding, the talking over the bonfire and the fishing all are typical, expected aspects of camping, but it seems the most memorable and enjoyable times are those unexpected events.

For Schooler, his most memorable camping experience took place when he and his friends stumbled upon a treasure in another man's trash.

"We found a leather couch in the dumpster on the way out of town. We thought it looked pretty comfortable, so we put it in the truck and took it with us," Schooler said. "We put it by the fire to sit on. Then, when we ran out of wood, we used the couch to keep the fire going. We did it in parts, cushions first."

"That was not something we did on every trip, and it was with some of my best friends," he said.

For Baack, one of his favorite camping stories was not because of an act of good fortune, but bad weather.

"It was with the Boy Scouts. We were camping, each of us on our own tent, and we got stuck in the middle of a thunderstorm, and there was a tornado warning," Baack said. "They sent out a search party for us, and they couldn't find us at first. When they did find us, we were just sleeping through the storm. Everything was fine."

Although not everyone would find sleeping outside during a tornado warning a fun time, those who camp think the general experience is something everyone needs to try.

"You don't have to worry about what you look like because everyone looks the same. It's a time to forget about that stuff and just be yourself," Kueck said.

'The Practice' awaits verdict on its future from ABC

The possibility that "The Practice" might come to what David E. Kelley, writer-producer, considers an unjust and untimely end on ABC has made him an outspoken advocate for his legal drama.

The two-hour episode that airs 8 p.m. Monday could be the season finale — or mark the end of a series that captured Emmys as best drama in 1998 and 1999.

Rome honors Audrey Hepburn

Rome is honoring Audrey Hepburn with an exhibit of 130 posters and sketches from Italian publicity campaigns for her movies, including 1953's "Roman Holiday."

Hepburn won a best-actress Oscar for her role in the film, co-starring Gregory Peck. She also starred in "Sabrina," "Breakfast at Tiffany's" and "My Fair Lady."

THE FOUR BIGGEST DIETING MISTAKES

By Rick Tague, M.D., M.P.H.
Board Certified in Medical Weight Management

If you made a New Year's resolution to lose weight but have struggled...or have already failed...you are not alone.

Numerous studies show that over 96% of all self-imposed diets fail to bring about a significant long-term weight loss. Regardless of how much willpower you have, the odds are against you when dieting on your own. And with less than a 4% chance of long-term success, you may ask, "why even try?"

Fortunately, a medical specialty called bariatric medicine has discovered simple, easy-to-follow solutions to the four biggest dieting mistakes. The biggest dieting mistakes are:

1. Using a "cookie cutter" approach to choosing your diet. I call this the "one size fits all" diet. No one gains weight...or loses weight...the same way. In order to be successful your program must be individualized around your personal needs, your likes and dislikes, your medical needs, your family history, your environment, your level of stress and more. Unfortunately, fad diets call for everyone to follow the same diet forever which accounts for such a dismal success rate.

2. No medical monitoring of your weight loss. This may lead to losing muscle and even bone versus losing body fat. Losing muscle causes your metabolism to slow down and contributes greatly to eventual weight regain and makes losing weight "the next time" even more difficult. Weight loss must be medically monitored to insure that what you are eating - how often and at what times during the day - causes you to melt away fat...not muscle.

3. Attempting to fight the "cravings battle" alone. Let's face it, cravings can be an almost impossible "enemy" to fight. The reason is that cravings are hardwired into your body's natural self-protection system.

Brain chemicals causing cravings is one of the ways your body preserves itself from starvation. Of course changing your eating habits by dieting doesn't mean you are starving, but your body doesn't know that. Fortunately, using an individualized high nutrient program, adjusting meal frequency, and other medical techniques including appetite suppressants (when appropriate and only if needed), can eliminate cravings which then makes losing unwanted fat pounds easy.

4. Not recognizing there may be underlying medical reasons causing your weight gain. Obviously fad diets do not address your individual medical history nor do they evaluate and monitor blood and lab findings that can provide quick answers to your past difficulty with losing weight. A physician specializing in medical weight management is able to identify and correct hormonal imbalances and other medical problems that can be the key to a slimmer you.

Losing weight doesn't have to be an uphill battle, and more than likely past failures haven't been your fault. An individual's genetics, metabolism, medical problems, life stresses and food cravings can make weight loss on your own a very difficult undertaking. Make sure any program you undertake avoids these four common mistakes.

Also, seek a medical doctor who specializes in nutrition and medical weight management. Not all physicians have this specialized training. And if you'd like more information about how you can finally achieve weight loss success, please call my office today at 776-4443 to set up a complimentary office visit.

North Korea says sanctions 'green light' to war

By Jae-suk Yoo
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

SEOUL, South Korea — North Korea said Wednesday that it would regard any U.S. move to seek U.N. sanctions against the communist country as "the green light to a war."

The warning came after South and North Korea agreed to try to peacefully resolve the nuclear crisis, though Pyongyang has said further talks with the United States are useless unless it drops its demand that the North first scrap suspected atomic weapons programs.

North Korea says abandoning such programs would leave it defenseless and has in the past said sanctions would be seen as a step toward war.

Pyongyang "will take self-defensive measures, regarding it as the green light to a war" if Washington seeks a U.N. resolution authorizing economic sanctions against it, North Korea said in a statement on KCNA, its official news agency.

South Korea's foreign minister, Yoon Young-kwan, declined to answer a reporter's question Tuesday as to whether the South would support sanctions. He described the issue as a "very delicate and very sensitive."

An unnamed spokesman for the North's Foreign Ministry was quoted as saying by KCNA that recent U.S. aggression compels North Korea "to opt for possessing a necessary deterrent force and put it into practice."

The agreement between the two Koreas pledging to resolve the dispute peacefully was made after four days of talks in Pyongyang.

But it was unlikely to mark a change in attitude by North Korea. The communist state agreed to similar communications at previous Cabinet-level talks.

The North has insisted that the South should not meddle in the nuclear standoff, calling it a dispute with the United States.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said the United States was reviewing an offer by North Korea to give up its missiles and nuclear facilities in exchange for substantial U.S. economic benefits.

The North Koreans floated the proposal in talks with U.S. envoys in Beijing last week. According to a senior U.S. official, North Korea said for the first time during that meeting that it had nuclear weapons and was contemplating exporting them, depending on U.S. actions.

In Beijing, Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao questioned whether North Korea made such an assertion. He said that as far as he knew, they have "not made such a statement."

He added that China, which also participated in the Beijing talks, supports the denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula but wants North Korea's "legitimate security concerns" to be addressed.

higher education.

Carlin said the revenue would help shore up the $254 million deficit, leaving $169 million in cash reserves at end of fiscal year 2004. The plan also would designate $21 million to help eliminate waiting lists for social services and $25 million to revive the retirement system.

Public schools would receive $28.9 million, increasing aid by $50 per pupil for each of the next three fiscal years, resulting in $4,013 per pupil by fiscal year 2006.

However, the plan would postpone a June 15 payment of $213 million to public schools, rescheduling payment to July 1. Sebelius, however, seemed hesitant to consider the proposal.

"We owe it to the people of Kansas to exhaust every effort to make sure government is operating as efficiently and effectively as possible before raising taxes," she said.

"I don't believe this effort is yet complete."

the new Palestinian prime minister.

Powell intends to follow up his talks with meetings with Sharon and Abbas later in the month. The aim is to implement the road map, which also calls for a rollback in Israeli settlements.

It was presented to Sharon by U.S. Ambassador Daniel Kurtzer and to Abbas by U.N. envoy Terje Larsen after Abbas was sworn in as the Palestinian Authority's prime minister. Abbas will be invited to the White House to meet with President Bush, Fleischer said. He did not say when the meeting would take place.

From the outset of his presidency, Bush has refused to invite Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader, and the administration sought to exclude him from its diplomacy in Middle East. Last June, Bush accused Arafat of being entwined in terror against Israel.

Powell, due in the region later in the week for talks in Syria and Lebanon, plans to return about a week later for talks with Abbas and Sharon.

Powell already has said he will apply pressure on both sides to carry out the "road map" schedule through 2005. It would create two states — one Jewish, one Palestinian — living side by side in peace.

That means Israel would have to transfer West Bank territory and Gaza to the Palestinians.

Whether the Bush administration intends to try to include part of Jerusalem in the deal has not been disclosed, probably because it is an explosive issue.

The Palestinian legislature's endorsement of Abbas as premier Tuesday is prompting hands-on U.S. diplomacy to seek an overall settlement in the long-lasting Arab-Israeli feud after delays that were criticized by European and Arab governments.

Powell told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee Tuesday that the administration would work hard to re-open negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians. He ruled out meeting with Abbas on a trip to the region this week.

like I'm her big sister."

Breyana Ramsey, 8, said she likes everything about the club — however, she has one favorite part.

"I especially like the candy machine," she said.

Precola Vereen, 7, said she likes the computer lab, Little Women and Girl Scouts.

Vereen said she liked making cards for nursing home members in the Little Women group time but likes the women time best.

Activities for volunteers range from guitar to photography lessons.

"We appreciate whatever they feel like they can give," Banks said.

In addition, Banks said Manhattan's program is always looking for more volunteers.

To volunteer, a one-page application is required, which can be obtained at the office or online.

The membership for the Manhattan Boys and Girls Club is more than 1,000 youth. The program is open to children ages 6 to 18 for $10 per year.

"We have kids from a varying economic background," Banks said, "from families who are barely holding their head out of the water to families that are walking on water."

Landon Lecture comments spark uproar

NBC's Banfield criticized for remarks on journalism

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A Landon Lecture by Ashleigh Banfield has put the reporter, the lecture series and K-State in the news media spotlight.

Ashleigh Banfield
NBC NEWS CORRESPONDENT

Last week, Banfield delivered a lecture that critiqued broadcast journalism's coverage of the war in Iraq.

The Hollywood Reporter printed an article that said Banfield, an NBC correspondent, was "taken to the woodshed" by NBC News president Neal Shapiro for her comments.

The article quoted an NBC spokesperson as saying, "She and we both agreed that she didn't intend to demean the work of her colleagues, and she will

Legislators reject proposed plan, avoid tax increase

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the Kansas House of Representatives rejected a proposal Thursday that would increase taxes in an effort to balance the state's $254 million deficit and boost aid to public schools.

Legislators voted 83-41 against the bill, which called for a half-cent sales tax increase and a 3.5-percent income tax surcharge.

Instead, House members chose to debate other budget-balancing efforts, such as postponement of tax refunds and advancement of gambling.

Republican leaders are pushing to delay $60 million in tax refunds next year. However, Gov. Kathleen Sebelius said she would reject the idea, proposing the state issue $300 million in bonds and expand gambling.

Sydney Carlin, D-Manhattan, one of 16 freshman legislators who drafted the rejected bill, said she was disappointed but hopeful.

"Our package is dead, and we have no revenue package to fund the government at this time," she said. "I'm hopeful that some of the Senior tight end released on bond

A K-State football player was arrested Wednesday following a domestic dispute that occurred earlier in the week.

Tight end Travon Magee was arrested for battery, criminal damage to property and witness intimidation, according to Riley County Police Department.

Magee, senior in social sciences, was released on $1,000 bond, Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the RCPD said Thursday.

The disturbance occurred at 1980 Lincoln Drive, Moldrup said. Lacie Spain, senior in social sciences, was the victim.

Spain could not be reached for comment, but Moldrup said she was not treated for injuries.

A wooden door, valued at $225, was damaged, resulting in the arrest for criminal damage to property, Moldrup said. Magee was also arrested for intimidation of the victim, he said.

Doug Dull, director of K-State Sports Information, said it would be handled internally.

"No information about disciplinary action would be released to the public," Dull said.

Dull said he did not know if Coach Bill Snyder would comment about Magee's arrest.

War campaign ends

Bush foresees long-term efforts

By Scott Lindlaw
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

USS ABRAHAM LINCOLN — President Bush, aboard an aircraft carrier steaming home from war, said Thursday night "the United States and our allies have prevailed" against Saddam Hussein and will confront any nation tied to terrorists.

"Major combat operations in Iraq have ended," Bush said from the deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln, which launched thousands of airstrikes on Iraq.

Bush flew to the carrier on a Navy jet and made a screeching stop as his plane was snagged by a cable stretched across the deck. He changed out of his flight suit to address thousands of cheering Navy personnel dressed in yellow, green and powder-blue crew shirts and crowded aboard the sun-dappled deck to hear their commander in chief. "The liberation of Iraq is a crucial advance in the campaign against terror," the president said. "We have removed an ally of al-Qaeda and cut off a source of terrorist funding. And this much is certain: No terrorist network will gain weapons of mass destruction from the Iraqi regime because that regime is no more."

Bush sought to give the nation a closure to the Denial, sadness and acceptance are all parts of the grieving process, but for Shamale Blackwell, the process started with anxiety.

On the day Blackwell's boyfriend, Spc. Larry Brown, was shot in Iraq, she was driving home from friends and felt a strange anxiety. She went home and crawled into bed, and later found that Brown had been killed that day.

"Our plans going into it were 'I am coming home,'" Blackwell, freshman in elementary education, said. "He didn't want to go, but he knew it was his job."

Blackwell received letters and phone calls from her boyfriend, but the last one came before spring break.

She said he told her, "I am getting ready to move. I am not going to be able to talk to you for a while."

It was then that Brown was moved from Kuwait into Iraq to join in fighting the war.

Blackwell watched the news every morning. She knew where Brown's brigade was located and if they were in combat. She talked to his mom every day, telling her the news she had gotten from Army wives.

"The military wives know things and helped a lot," she said. "I would just relay the North Korea urges workers to be combat-ready

North Korea on Thursday urged its workers to prepare for war with the United States, while South Korea's president said he will visit Washington to seek a peaceful solution to the nuclear crisis. CAMPUS CONNECTION

Students experience stressors related to job searches, graduation, final exams

By Kari Kennedy
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After graduating in just a few weeks, Shawna Dillon will be packing up and moving away to start her new teaching job.

Although she is excited about her new job, she is stressed about the new life she is about to start.

Campus Connection

Read each Friday about an issue that affects K-State as well as another campus in the United States.

"I'm stressed about how things are going to go next year because I don't know what all I'm doing yet," Dillon, senior in secondary education, said. "I need to get prepared for that."

Graduation and finals can add to students' stress levels, officials said.

"Finals tend to be a more intense period," Arthur Rathbun, bio-feedback specialist for Lafene Counseling Services, said.

"Students will have more stress than normal because a little more of their grade rests on what happens in these next couple of weeks."

Mario Antoine, sophomore in biology and pre-medicine, said finals are a big stressor.

"You work yourself to death for a semester and that could all change with one exam or paper," he said.

Time can also be an issue, Hallie Perryman, sophomore in advertising, said.

"This time of year is stressful because there isn't enough time left to do everything that you want to get done," she said. "Finding time to study for finals and having a social life might conflict with each other since time is short."

Many students are experiencing stress as the semester ends. Factors include stressing over finals, graduating, and finding a job.

Finding a summer job also can add to the stress of the last few weeks of the semester.

"Many students depend on summer employment to earn money for next semester," Rathbun said. "The longer it takes to get a job, the more stress that results."

No matter what the stressor, finding ways to deal with stress can help lessen the load of finals.

"It is very important from now through final period to have a well-developed schedule," Rathbun said. "It keeps you from not getting too overwhelmed and you have a sense of controlling your time."

Rathbun said getting as much rest as possible and keeping a good diet is also important when battling stressful times.

Taking a walk, listening to music, and just simply taking a break can relieve the built up stress, he said.

"Find a good friend," Antoine said. "They are probably the biggest stress reliever."

End of semester often adds to stress load

By Kristen M. Neufeld
DAILY COLLEGIAN (PENNSYLVANIA STATE U.)

UNIVERSITY PARK, Pa. - For many students, stress does not end when final exams end. The transition from being at school to returning home or starting a new job can cause some students to feel anxious or depressed, experts say.

"One of the main stressors is what to do next," said Sandy Newes, a pre-doctoral intern at the Center for Counseling and Psychological Services at Pennsylvania State University.

She said seniors who are graduating might have anxiety if they are unsure about their post-graduation plans.

"It can be really stressful for people who haven't immediately found a job," she said. "If all their friends have jobs, they might feel inadequate."

Nathaniel Porter, senior in mineral economics, said he tries to think positively, but he does worry that his life will not progress the way he wants it to.

"I think it would be disappointing to come here for four years, then leave and be in the same place as before," he said.

Students who are not graduating can also feel stressed about life after classes end.

"There is a lack of structure that is familiar to them," Newes said. "They are used to having a schedule, and now that structure is no longer in place."

Additionally, freshmen who are returning for their first summer back home might be worried that their relationships with family and friends have changed.

"People subconsciously expect things to be the same, but you can't expect that," Newes said. "Recognize that things will have changed with your friends and family."

She said it is best for students not to expect to pick up exactly where they left off with their friends.

"Take an honest look at yourself and how you have changed since you've been at school, and recognize that others have gone through the same process," she said.

First-year students returning home must also learn to live with their parents again, which can be difficult because students often have different expectations than their parents, Newes said.

"Your parents might think you'll be living by the same rules as in high school, but you're used to living by your own rules," she said. "Avoid a misunderstanding before it happens and talk to your parents at the beginning of the summer about what their expectations are."

Some students become depressed because they are parting with relationships. Newes said they should be clear about their expectations.

"Take a look at yourself and your needs, as far as dating, monogamy and contact are concerned," she said.

Many couples experience problems while apart over the summer because one person wants to stay in touch more often than the other, she said.

For these reasons, it is common for many college students to feel stressed around this time of year, especially because classes and final exams add to that burden, she said. There are many physical and emotional signs that indicate a person is stressed.

"They can be agitated signs, such as constantly tucking your hair behind your ears, being fidgety, or talking and moving fast," she said. "On the other hand, some people show their stress by sleeping all the time or social withdrawal as they prepare to put certain relationships on hold."

Senate amends new weapons policy

Amendment passed after student reportedly brought weapon to class

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student senators passed an amendment to the K-State by-laws Thursday to include a new weapons policy.

The bill was requested by university administration after a report of a student bringing a weapon to class this year, Gayle Spencer, coordinator of student activities, said.

"It started with someone bringing a weapon to class and administration asked the dean of student life to look at the weapon policy," she said.

Senators passed the bill with a 39-1-1 vote, which was amended to bring the student conduct code into agreement with the current policies at K-State.

"We just need to clarify these policies for administration so that everything will all come together and policies will reflect what's in the by-laws," Laurie Quaife, student

Student Senate

The following items were discussed at Thursday night:

- An amendment to the K-State by-laws to include a new weapons policy passed with a 39-1-1 vote.
- An amendment to the honor system constitution passed unanimously.

senate chair, said.

Under the amendment, K-State prohibits the possession or use of firearms, explosives, weapons or dangerous chemicals on university premises or at a university-sponsored activity or any other violation of the University's Weapon Policy.

According to the student handbook, a weapon is defined as any object designed to inflict a wound, cause injury or create a reasonable fear of harm, including but not limited to all firearms, switchblade knives, explosives, and dangerous chemicals or poisons.

Student volunteers assist people in crisis situations

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some K-State students are living a secret life.

Students who volunteer for the Women's Crisis Center are very familiar with discretion. Concerns about safety and confidentiality – namely for those women who come to the center asking for help – cause many of the volunteers not to receive recognition.

Despite the lack of pay or recognition, however, Hannah Luetke and Nicole Bradbury devote a few hours a week to the Crisis Center.

Judy Davis, executive director of the Women's Crisis Center, said all volunteers are required to complete a 16-hour training course. Part of the training includes applicants to go through interviews and a screening.

"We want to be sure folks are a good match," Davis said. Davis said the program is not for everyone.

But for Bradbury, sophomore in open-option, volunteering at the center has been a good experience for her, she said.

"I really wanted to volunteer," she said.

Luetke also wanted to volunteer, but it was a class that led her to the center. She said she took part in the training as part of a women's studies project.

While some classes might lead students to the Crisis Center, Davis said this is not always the case.

Volunteers

This is the final story in the Collegian's series on student volunteers. Today, take a look at how two students donate their time to give women a better look at life.

Volunteers are given an array of tasks, Davis said, such as answering the crisis hotline, spending time with children, running errands and helping out with the safe shelter.

Luetke said she has helped out in a variety of ways.

"A lot of women don't have cars," Luetke said. "I have transported one of the women on some runs."

Volunteers are not allowed to do any of the counseling because they are not properly trained. However, they are educated on domestic violence.

Luetke said this knowledge has been very valuable.

"I have learned a lot about domestic violence, which has been good because it tends to be such a taboo topic," she said.

Bradbury agreed that the training she has received has been very beneficial.

And Both Luetke and Bradbury contend that working at the Crisis Center has been very gratifying. If they have the time to continue volunteering, both said they would.

"We are not directly faced with the most disturbing cases, but the people we do see are just like everyone else, except they need some help," Bradbury said.

Evening degree programs to be available for students in fall

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There might be more students on campus this fall, and it's not because of a large freshman class.

K-State's Fort Riley program is moving to the Manhattan campus, said Betty Stevens, associate vice provost for information technology partnerships and associate dean of continuing education.

"The program will stay the same as far as the courses offered, but the courses will be taught on campus now," she said.

Stevens said the move may affect some students' tuitions.

"The military students already have a special way of paying for their education, and that will not change," she said. "Other students have been paying the off-campus fee and will start paying the on-campus fee."

The move might also affect out-of-state students, which make up about 6 percent of non-military students who are enrolled in the Fort Riley program, she said.

Stevens said another change will be the establishment of a new program to complement the Fort Riley program.

"We have created Evening College for longer-distance commuting students who aren't able to take K-State's distance courses," she said.

"It's designed in such a way that students can take the courses without taking any daytime classes at all," she said.

Stevens said the program will not offer many lower-level classes.

"Most of those are available online from different community colleges across Kansas. Students might have to piece together courses from other places, but this program is designed so students won't have to take any ordinary classes during the day."

Although the program is not aimed at traditional students, Stevens said any student is allowed to participate in Evening College.

"However, I would like to emphasize that Evening College is targeted at a new audience of adult students," she said.

Stevens also said K-State's current evening courses are separate from the Evening College courses.

Melinda Sinn, public information coordinator for the Department of Continuing Education, said there will be three degree programs available in the fall.

"They're the same three that are already available at Fort Riley: criminal justice, interdisciplinary social sciences and lifespan human development," she said.

The program hopefully will develop further in the future, Sinn said.

"Of course we are going to start out slow," she said. "In the future, we can hopefully have graduate school opportunities available, too."

TO THE POINT Consequences of war must be remembered

President George Bush addressed the nation Thursday, saying the combat portion of the war in Iraq is over. He praised troops for a job well done and boasted about the short amount of time it took to topple Saddam Hussein's regime.

But war is not that easy. There is another side to the story.

Innocent Iraqi civilians are dead because of Bush's quest to liberate them. Some estimates reach more than 2,000. Young American soldiers lost their lives while following orders.

We have yet to understand the full consequences of the war in Iraq. We also don't know the full ramifications of going to war without the support of the United Nations. The United States is seen as an imperialistic conqueror in the eyes of many in the global community.

Another war with Syria, Iran or North Korea isn't as horrifying to the American public as it should be. Americans didn't see the dead bodies, the shattered homes and the tears as Iraqis buried their loved ones.

War is not as easy as the government would like us to believe. People are dead, families are grieving and a nation is forever changed.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

BULLY OR DEFENDER?

Anti-terror policy should focus more on domestic security

No one likes a bully. Unfortunately, that's the way many people in the world see the United States — as a colossal tyrant that forcefully imposes its will on every other nation. This has only been exacerbated by recent U.S. actions against sovereign states in the name of preventing terrorism.

The U.S. government's reputation and relationships with other states will suffer dramatically unless President Bush changes his foreign policy. It is the right — and the responsibility — of the federal government to prevent terrorism in the United States. It is more problematic to undertake military action against other sovereign states without the support of the international community.

The administration should stop taking nearly unilateral action against states and organizations it deems dangerous. Rather, it should shift its emphasis to preventing domestic terrorism by increasing state-side security measures.

An increase in security in the United States would help the American people feel safer. The domestic terrorism alert has been high for months, and the American people deserve a little more peace of mind. Unfortunately, U.S. involvement in conflict overseas very well may have increased the danger of attacks by people who believe we want to implement an oppressive regime in their land.

MSNBC correspondent Ashleigh Banfield addressed this problem in her Landon Lecture last week. She commented on the fact that many Afghani and Iraqi people firmly believe the United States wants to hurt them. They have no exposure to America other than violent conflict — and sometimes civilian casualties.

Will these people be less likely to hate America after seeing their neighbors become collateral damage in an "unfortunate incident"? What if, in our attempts to liberate the people of other nations, we inadvertently produce more anti-American sentiment?

In addition to slowing the spread of anti-American sentiment, switching to a more domestic anti-terrorism approach could potentially help the American economy. According to National Public Radio news, "war jitters" have been a significant factor in the dismal economy of the last quarter. The Iraqi conflict has caused uncertainty, and that has discouraged investment.

If we continue to engage in extensive armed conflicts against Bush's Axis of Evil, our economy could very well suffer as a result.

More importantly, however, limiting the use of U.S. muscle overseas would help restore our international reputation.

It might be hard for us to believe, but much of the world sees the United States as an arrogant, imperialistic power trying to leverage its military might into a political and economic advantage in the Middle East.

Again, this was evidenced in the recent Iraqi conflict, in which our only significant allies were Australia and the United Kingdom. According to The Weekend Australian, neither of those countries' populations polled as pro-American in the days before the war.

Suspicion of American intentions in the Middle East could be a further blow to America's reputation. Despite Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's vigorous claims that the U.S. has no plans to establish bases in Iraq, the strategic value of Iraqi bases cannot be denied — especially if the so-called War on Terror continues in its present course.

The United States' best hope of retaining any kind of legitimacy in international relations is to refocus its anti-terrorism campaigns back toward its own soil.

Further military encroachment — particularly in the Middle East — would pose a serious threat to good diplomatic relations with other states. As a member of the international community, the United States should try to cooperate with international efforts to root out terrorism overseas. We should take no military action unless we have the support of a large, diverse coalition of nations.

We should not start anymore all-but-unilateral conflicts over U.N. resolutions when the U.N. wants to work out diplomatic solutions. This is especially true since we routinely ignore the U.N. as a legitimate body that represents the opinions of other nations.

The administration needs to bring the focus of its anti-terrorism program back to the United States. This would help stop the spread of anti-American sentiment. It would also help our economy. Most importantly, however, it would make us seem a little less like the biggest, most violent and selfish kid in the sandbox.

Preemptive measures will ensure America's safety, guide policies

"We will defend the peace by fighting terrorists and tyrants. We will preserve the peace by building good relations among the great powers. We will extend the peace by encouraging free and open societies on every continent."

President Bush presented this mission statement on Sept. 17, 2002, in his report, "The National Security Strategy of the United States of America."

With any luck, it will continue to guide our foreign policy in the years to come.

Specifically, I interpret this to mean our primary focus in the war on terror should involve preemptive action against terrorists, a policy I back fully.

After all, it is the War On Terror, not the Siege By Terror.

Why include not only states that actively support terror, but other authoritarian regimes as well?

Political scientists will tell you that such states are producing the raw material for al-Qaeda and other terrorist groups that use Islam as a front for political change: young men, often with little wealth and always with no political voice.

Remove these regimes, and we can cripple radical Islamic terror, they might argue.

Some people think the United States is acting like a belligerent rogue state, but this simply is not true.

According to international law, "Nations need not suffer an attack before they can lawfully take action to defend themselves against forces that present an imminent danger of attack."

This doesn't mean we should neglect the security of our homeland. Obviously, such an aggressive policy will invite further attacks, and we must be prepared to meet that threat fully.

However, to simply focus on domestic security to the exclusion of all else is folly.

After all, that was basically the policy stated in President Bill Clinton's final National Security Strategy of 1999.

Its stated goals were: "To enhance America's security. To bolster America's economic prosperity. To promote democracy and human rights abroad."

John Lewis Gaddis, Yale University history professor, pointed out the obvious distinction in the two presidents' statements, saying, "The Bush objectives speak of defending, preserving and extending peace; the Clinton statement seems simply to assume peace."

It also is worth mentioning that Clinton's defensive mindset is the sort of thinking that allowed the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to happen in the first place. This domestic focus, neglecting foreign action, is detrimental for three reasons.

First, such a defensive approach does nothing to undermine the causes of terror. America does have a poor image with many peoples in the Middle East and elsewhere, for a variety of reasons I will not repeat here.

There is nothing that can be done about it now, except to try and improve our standing through action. By this, I mean trying to implement some kind of democratic process to improve people's way of life in countries like Iraq and Afghanistan.

Conveniently, some of the countries that could most benefit from this, those with corrupt or tyrannical governments, are also those with links to anti-American terrorism.

Second, there is no such thing as 100-percent security.

Even if we stop 999 attacks in 1,000, that one successful strike will be severely demoralizing and only encourage terrorists further. That one crime will be a victory to wipe away all their other failures.

Finally, a defensive mindset just doesn't make much sense, given America's geopolitical situation.

If this was a tiny nation or one with limited borders, it might be a good plan. But America is vast and defense just doesn't seem like a natural choice, especially when we also possess the world's most powerful military and the ability to project that might anywhere.

In so many strategic situations, the best defense is a good offense. Which is better, I ask: spending billions on inherently imperfect security measures or spending billions on military action that will kill terrorists in their caves and hideouts?

We can sit around waiting for the next terrorist attack, or we can take the fight to the terrorists themselves. After all, on Sept. 11, 2001, they fired the first shots in this war.

Graverson, community outreach chair for the Red Cross, said people don't know that the Midwest has the fast-growing number of AIDS cases.

"People generally expect

AIDS to be an issue of the coasts or the South, but it is prevalent in this area as well," she said.

Jason Lantz, assistant director of the American Red Cross, agreed there is a lack of awareness in Manhattan.

Lantz said there are about 40 cases of HIV/AIDS in Manhattan.

"We want people to understand it is here but not be afraid," he said.

Graverson said she hopes their message is heard.

"If we can educate just one person then we have done our job," she said.

messages back to his mom."

Then on Monday, April 7, Blackwell got a call while she was studying. A relative of Brown told her he was killed — shot in the stomach — two days earlier in Iraq.

"I didn't want to believe it," Blackwell said. "I called back, and I noticed in his mom's voice — that's when I knew."

Soon after she heard the bad news, Blackwell turned on the TV to a Pentagon press conference.

"I turned on the TV and they had a press conference at the Pentagon, and they said his name," she said. "We were praying it was a mistake."

Blackwell said she was hoping he had just been injured.

"If they had to take off one of his legs — I would push him around in a wheelchair. We'd still be in love," she said.

In his last letter to Blackwell, Brown wrote, "Whatever happens when I am over here, know I love you."

At his funeral in Jackson, Miss., Fort Riley soldiers attended, and Blackwell said she was surprised how much Brown's death affected them.

"They took it harder than we expected," she said. "They all had tears in their eyes. They didn't know Larry, but the simple fact it could have been them scared them."

Brown's family has also had to cope with another controversy. The Army Times newspaper, distributed on army bases, printed a photo of Brown right after he was shot, despite letters from the family members pleading it not be printed.

Blackwell has requested the photo be mailed to her even though she knows it will be hard to look at.

"I just watched by boyfriend get buried. I have already been through the worst," she said. "Part of me wants to know what he looked like. I want to know what happened."

"It won't bring closure, but it will let me know what he was going through."

It is her faith that keeps Blackwell going despite all the horrors in her life.

"I made sure he had his Bible in his bag," she said. "Getting involved with Student Life on campus, they talked to me about seeing counselors. What I have always kept in mind is I don't need to go to man, I can go to God."

Now, as she learns to live without her boyfriend, Blackwell said she feels lost.

"We were going to conquer the world. I don't know which way to go," she said.

"He gave me a lot of support, and I don't know where to start."

BUSH Mission against terror continues fighting while avoiding a sweeping claim of overall victory. He said much still needed to be done, including bringing order to the country, finding weapons of mass destruction, creating a democratic government and pursuing leaders of the fallen regime, including Saddam.

"The battle of Iraq is one victory in a war on terror that began on Sept. 11, 2001, and still goes on," he said.

Bush did not declare victory or an end to the war. That could trigger international laws requiring the release of prisoners of war, limiting efforts to go after deposed Iraqi leaders and designating the nation as an occupying power.

"Our mission continues," he said. "Al-Qaeda is wounded, not destroyed. The scattered cells of the terrorist network still operate in many nations, and we know from daily intelligence that they continue to plot against free people. The proliferation of deadly weapons remains a serious danger. The enemies of freedom are not idle, and neither are we."

Test run prepares Wildcats

Track team trains for championship

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The Big 12 Track and Field Championship is two weeks and 700 miles away.

Before the Cats think about their May 17-19 trek to Austin, Texas, they will face a test run this weekend at Nebraska's Ward Haylett Invitational.

The meet, in Lincoln, Neb., at Ed Weir Stadium, will feature four other Big 12 schools — Colorado, Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri — and in-state rival Wichita State.

As many athletes will get next week off, this weekend may make for a good final test before the conference meet.

"These programs are all pretty good," Coach Cliff Rovelto said. "The quality of the meet is pretty high. Any wins will have to be quality performances."

The invitational also represents the Cats' first scored meet in the last several weeks. Larger meets like the Drake Relays are geared toward individual performances, and team scores are not kept.

Attending a scored meet is an important pretense to competing in the Big 12, Rovelto said.

"It is nice to have a scored meet," he said. "In the outdoor, you don't get that as much."

Even though someone will be keeping score, K-State won't necessarily be bent on getting the win. With the team's training winding down in anticipation of the postseason, Rovelto said he's more concerned with getting everyone healthy.

"To win this meet, we'd probably have to pull out all the stops," he said. "We don't want to do that now. We are trying to put good athletes in every event, but some people are banged up."

Indeed, a week off may be helpful to several injury-hounded Wildcats.

Jared MacLeod finished second in the 60-meter hurdles at the indoor conference meet but has been battling injury and will likely be out this weekend. Christian Smith, fourth in the conference in the indoor 1,000 meter, may also miss the meet due to a foot injury.

Joseph Lee, the Big 12 indoor 800 champion, is likely to be redshirted for the season. A string of seemingly minor injuries has prevented him from competition all season, and Rovelto wasn't sure he'd be healthy this season.

"Some of the kids are a little banged up and are only doing one event. Some aren't competing at all," Rovelto said. "Those are athletes that can place in the conference."

Cats start new month hopeful for positive finish

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Maybe a new month will help the K-State baseball team.

As K-State (12-30, 2-16) travels to Waco, Texas, this weekend for a three-game set with Baylor (31-17, 11-10), the Cats leave behind a horrendous 2-14 April.

Things won't get easier as the calendar switches to May, however, as the Bears field the Big 12's top offense.

The Bears are one of the most dangerous teams in the conference, averaging 8.2 runs a game. Baylor also enters the series leading the conference in runs, hits, doubles, home runs and RBI.

Coach Mike Clark said the Cats just need to come ready to play.

"They're a very good offense," Clark said. "We have to get ahead in the count and hit our pitch. They can put up a lot of runs in a hurry."

K-State's offense has been another story. The Cats have scored only six runs in the past four games, something Clark said must improve to be successful against Baylor.

"The University of Texas and Wichita State had a lot to do with that," Clark said. "That's two of the best pitching staffs in the country."

Other than two tough teams, Clark attributed the poor offensive output to injuries to key players this spring.

"We're playing without two or three of our starters — our best hitter and our starting right fielder — out of the lineup. It's kind of tough when you're losing a Ty Soto and a Gabe Luttrell."

"But we have an opportunity for some of the other guys to step up and help us win ballgames," Clark said.

K-State will need help from its struggling pitching staff if it is to leave Waco with any wins. Senior Kevin Melcher will start game for the Cats at 7 tonight. Junior Jim Ripley, who has been the most consistent pitcher for Clark, will start game two at 3 p.m. Saturday.

Clark said he is sending his best arms to the mound against the Bears in hopes of pulling out a victory.

"We've got to continue to get ahead in the count," he said. "Especially Jim. He's been able to throw three pitches for strikes and be able to throw them at any time. He's going to have to be able to do that again this weekend because Baylor is one of the top offenses in the Big 12."

"The players have a lot of confidence when he's out on the mound," Clark said. "They know he's going to do a good job and keep us in the ballgame."

In his last two outings, Ripley has been impressive, allowing only four earned runs on nine hits, with 16 strikeouts and three walks in 15 innings.

Ripley said he hasn't changed his approach that much, just sharpened his focus.

"I've just tried to get ahead in the count," he said. "When I get ahead just to make sure I get an out and let the defense work behind me."

"My mindset has changed," Ripley said. "I'm just trying to have fun and just get guys out as quick as possible. I think right now all of us are trying to go right at guys instead of trying to pitch around them."

Women's basketball | Nonconference foes

Four games, including two in Bramlage Coliseum, against teams that appeared in postseason play last year highlight the K-State Wildcats' 2003-04 women's basketball non-conference schedule for eighth-year Coach Deb Patterson.

George Washington and potentially Penn State, which advanced to the NCAA Tournament, headline the Wildcats' non-league schedule. Three other opponents — Western Illinois, Iowa and Creighton — qualified for the Women's National Invitational Tournament last year.

K-State opens the home portion of its non-conference schedule in Bramlage Coliseum when the Wildcats play Western Illinois Nov. 21.

MLB | Big Unit's surgery successful

Four-time NL Cy Young Award winner Randy Johnson underwent successful arthroscopic knee surgery Thursday afternoon, his first operation in seven years.

Johnson, who was 24-5 last season en route to his fourth straight Cy Young Award, won his first game in three decisions Sunday after spending two weeks on the disabled list.

Doctors removed the particles in a brief procedure Thursday, and also drained fluid from the knee. Johnson is expected to miss three to six weeks.

MLB | Players approve world series change

Baseball players agreed to a two-year experiment Thursday to give home-field advantage in the World Series to the league that wins the All-Star game.

Owners approved the proposal Jan. 17, and players had been discussing it since before agreeing to it on a trial basis. Despite the approval, some players are against the new idea.

College basketball | Another going pro

Marcus Moore, Washington State's leading scorer last season, said Thursday he will skip his senior season and enter the NBA draft.

The 6-foot-6 guard has not hired an agent and has until June 19 to withdraw his name and return to college. The draft is June 26.

Moore missed nine games last season with an ankle injury but finished fifth in the Pacific-10 in scoring with an 18.2 average.

College football | Price meets with officials

Alabama coach Mike Price met with school officials Thursday amid reports he spent hundreds of dollars at a topless bar the night before a woman charged more than $1,000 in food and drinks to his hotel room bill.

His future at Alabama could be decided at a trustees meeting Saturday. University president Robert Witt called for the meeting "to present and discuss his decision regarding Price's status as head football coach."

Price was hired away from Washington State in December and has yet to coach a game with the Crimson Tide.

Witt and athletic director Mai Moore met with the coach. Witt said he hoped "to bring closure to this situation as soon as possible."

College basketball | Eustachy vows to fight

Suspended basketball coach Larry Eustachy will fight to keep his job at Iowa State and is confident he could regain his credibility.

"It's the only way I know how," Eustachy said Thursday on ESPN Radio. "You preach that and you teach that. I just believe that I'm the best person for this situation. Until I'm told that I'm not, I'm going to fight for it."

Eustachy spoke with ESPN Radio one day after revealing he was being treated for alcoholism and learning that athletic director Bruce Van De Velde had recommended that he be fired.

Golden State Warriors guard Gilbert Arenas won the NBA's Most Improved Player award Thursday after receiving 41 of 118 first-place votes and finishing with 288 points.

Women's crew team hopes to glisten in Lawrence Invitational

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

It's been a roller-coaster season for K-State rowing. Inconsistency has been the Wildcats' plague.

But now they have the chance to shine.

Wildcat rowers will compete Saturday in the third-annual Big 12 Invitational at the Kansas River-Burcham Park in Lawrence. Heats begin at 9:30 a.m. with the fastest boats advancing to the afternoon finals.

While Big 12 schools K-State, Kansas and Texas battle for the point trophy, they also will battle Baylor, Tulsa and Drake on the water. Those three schools will compete despite not being Big 12 varsity programs.

"It's always a good regatta," Coach Jenny Hale said. "The core three schools in the conference are quite competitive, and we invite some of those other schools to up the level of competition."

The Big 12 Invitational hasn't been kind to K-State, however. No Wildcat boat has won a title, something senior Alyssa Adams plans to change.

"There's a little pressure," she said. "We know it's going to count. Rowing as an underdog is a good place to be, because you can go out with nothing to lose."

The Wildcats have seen every school except Baylor and Drake this spring. At the Longhorn Invitational in March, Texas beat K-State 4-0 before the Wildcats swept three races from Tulsa.

K-State is coming off a 15-8 loss to KU in the Kansas Cup on April 19. Only the first varsity eight boat won.

While it might be easy for K-State to look for revenge against the Jayhawks, Hale said all focus will be on beating nationally ranked Texas.

"They have a strong program going," Hale said. "We have to stay focused on them rather than on a rematch with Kansas."

That's because chances to impress the NCAA are dwindling. A win over Texas would likely show the selection committee for the National Championships what K-State can do.

It would also give K-State a boost heading to the Central Division Sprints, May 16-17.

"If it comes down to a race between

K-State's crew members Susie Truax, Carissa Land and Lorie Holcomb compete in the Varsity 8 at Tuttle Creek Lake during the Kansas Cup Regatta.

Matt Elliott

us and Kansas, it's just regional," Hale said. "If you beat a Texas, all of a sudden you're at a different level. It becomes national."

Beating Texas would be especially sweet for Hale. Longhorn Coach Carie Graves was Hale's coach at Harvard in the early 1980s.

Lineup changes were made to nearly every boat following the Kansas Cup. With four freshmen in the second varsity eight and three in the first varsity four, Hale said the boats are moving faster regardless of inexperience.

"I think some of the changes we've made have helped in terms of confidence and execution," Hale said. "I'm really happy with the way the second varsity eight is starting to look. We've done some technical work that will help the boat speed overall."

Senior Brandy Sherwood said winning goes beyond the technical aspect of competition, however.

"The most important thing for us is to reach our individual, internal goals," Sherwood said.

For K-State, the biggest goal is beating Texas and capturing its first Big 12 Invitational crown.

"We've built a strong sense of working together and preparing," Sherwood said, "and hopefully that will carry us through."

Playboy undermines indie fans

JJ DUNCAN

Female sexuality has been exploited to sell music for at least as long as Billie Holiday has been around, but things just got worse.

We music snobs like to think popular music holds one bastion where people buy albums for musical quality and not for how the artists look. It's a bastion where the artists will likely never be popular enough with a mainstream audience to hit the MTV airwaves or show off those hot looks on "Saturday Night Live." That bastion is indie rock.

Apparently not even we music snobs' stronghold is safe from the infiltration of superficial media outlets.

Allow me to quote for you an e-mail I received promoting an Athens, Ga., band on Crack Rock Records led up by the stripper-esque lead singer Amber Valentine. The band is called Jucifer.

"Jucifer's AMBER VALENTINE is currently featured on Playboy.com's search for 'the sexiest woman in indie rock.' She is currently in second place following Neko Case. Go to www.playboy.com and check it out. And please vote!"

The key phrase here is "Playboy.com's search for 'the sexiest woman in indie rock.'" That's right, Playboy is looking for the hottest indie rocker out there. And the kicker is Playboy will ask the winner to pose nude.

It wouldn't be so offensive if it had a bunch of guys voting among J. Lo, Britney and Christina. Or maybe vote on the best rack on a drunken Limp Bizkit fan on spring break.

But don't tell Playboy readers that indie rock chicks are hot.

Regardless of its truth, this is the kind of thing many indie and punk fans try to avoid when they begin to delve into music that is removed from mass marketing and advertising. Everyone who has seen her picture knows Neko Case is as beautiful as her country-tinged voice, but that isn't why most people buy her music.

In fact, many of those fans probably also own albums from Case's label mates on Bloodshot Records. One of them is the Meat Purveyors, whose lead singer is a chick with some attitude who is probably a little too heavy to be asked to pose for Playboy.

True music connoisseurs know image may still matter, but true talent is blind.

Hopefully, most guys who mindlessly drift to playboy.com will ignore the indie chick thing and do their best to find free nude photos of peroxide blondes with silicone implants. Personally, I don't want to stand next to someone at a concert who is drooling over a lead singer and not listening to the music.

The best-case scenario is that it turns out all these artists want to keep fans that respect them for the music and turn down the Playboy offers.

Case is winning for now, and personally, I think old Hugh will have a hard time convincing her to take it all off. Let's just hope I'm right.

SECRET IDENTITY

High-suspense thriller delivers thrills, clichés

Summer movies are just around the corner — typically a crop of high-dollar special effects extravaganzas and silly, mindless comedies and thrillers. "Identity" is a perfect transition movie, a highly suspenseful flick with a nice, solid story included.

The setup appears to be pretty simple. One dark, stormy night, 10 strangers wind up stranded at a rundown motel, unable to travel on, due to flooded roads. One by one, people begin to turn up dead.

Among the hodgepodge of characters congregated at the hotel are an ex-cop-turned-limo-driver (John Cusack), a fading actress (Rebecca DeMornay) a prostitute (Amanda Peet), a newlywed couple (Clea Duvall and William Lee Scott), the jittery hotel owner (John Hawkes), a husband (John McGinley) with his son and injured wife and a police officer (Ray Liotta) transporting a prisoner (Jake Busey).

Though at first it seems obvious who must be the killer, the situation quickly becomes less clear-cut. Things get really weird when the bodies start disappearing, and the few people not yet dead discover they all have the same birthday. Not to mention they all have secrets and/or dark pasts.

"Identity" isn't a straightforward slasher film. The plot has more twists and turns than a rabbit tunnel and is terrifically hard to describe without being a spoiler. It definitely keeps you guessing.

Suspense runs high from the first second on. This movie can definitely be classified as an edge-of-your-seat type of show. However, cutting back on the gore would work well here. Less is usually more, and leaving some things up to the imagination is one of the best ways to scare.

Just how original "Identity" is can be debated. The screenplay, by Michael Cooney and director James Mangold, borrows many ideas from other books and movies and tosses them together. Plus, the movie falls into its fair share of clichés.

Dealing with so many characters presents problems, too. The nature of this movie makes it difficult to examine their personalities very thoroughly. A few half-hearted attempts are made. However, the twist of the movie makes characterization something of a moot point.

The big surprise of the movie is unique and interesting, but awkward to some extent. It comes with too much action remaining in the movie and changes the scenario entirely. It will excite some people, but it is bound to anger some, as well.

Flaws notwithstanding, "Identity" is consistently slick and interesting. It may not make any big breakthroughs, but it's enjoyable, it's edgy and it will generate discussion. That is probably more than can be said for most of the upcoming summer junk.

"IDENTITY"

Movie review by Wendy Gorman

Madonna reinvents herself again in latest album

"Nothing is what it seems," Madonna sings in her new single and album, "American Life." Madonna, an American icon, lives in England. One of the world's best-selling authors of pornographic picture books is married with children.

According to her lyrics, the so-called Material Girl has cast aside materialism — when she's not singing themes for James Bond movies.

Madonna has awakened from her American dream to reinvent herself again. Two albums removed from her Hindu period, one album removed from her cowgirl period, she now enters her political activist/rapper period.

If you've seen the unedited version of the "American Life" video, you've seen her agitprop pop. If you've heard the song, you've heard her going where no white woman has successfully gone before. Instead of rapping about cars and cribs, she raps about soy latte, yoga and Pilates, and she sarcastically tells us how satisfied she is.

"AMERICAN LIFE"

Album review by Matthew Webber she's ever done. I don't know if I'm satisfied with the computerized production of every song.

Madonna has made an entire career out of anticipating and then following trends, from disco to pop to gospel to techno. For almost 20 years, she has changed her appearance and personality to be both the freshest and least authentic pop star on MTV.

Madonna's contradictions are more interesting than her music, even when her music is as great as half of the songs on "American Life." "Nothing Fails," with its gospel denouement, is as catchy and revealing as "Like a Prayer." "Hollywood" has a similar melody and moral (Hollywood is fake) to recent Chili Peppers songs.

When Madonna isn't condemning American life, she's questioning her own, which is far more interesting. Remove the album artwork of a sword-fighting and gun-toting Madonna, ignore the lyrics about chefs and nannies, and you'll hear an artist who doubts her former blonde ambition.

Although the personal is often political, "American Life" is more personal than political. When Madonna sings "I'm So Stupid" and "Nobody Knows Me," she wants us to know she's not stupid at all. She sings about her "Mother and Father" and about religion.

When Madonna sings in her own voice instead of that of a robot, she sounds more sad than cynical. The problem is you rarely get to hear her without that annoying vocoder effect.

'Jerry Springer — the Opera' rejuvenates London stage

"All my guests have guilty secrets," sings an onstage Jerry Springer.

The secrets spill forth in "Jerry Springer — The Opera," the Royal National Theater's first major production under its new artistic director, Nicholas Hytner. The production, which opened Tuesday, makes one of America's trashiest TV shows into something resembling high art.

Need a magic wand to graduate on time?

Well, it may not be magic, but summer school at Wichita State can do some pretty incredible things — like make an entire semester disappear in as little as two weeks. It's not smoke and mirrors, just an easy, convenient way to get in a class or two while you're home between semesters. And as always, credits earned at WSU are easily transferable to K-State. So, take summer school at Wichita State, and in the blink of an eye you'll be closer to graduation and still have plenty of time to enjoy summer before heading back to Manhattan.

Enrollment is now open,
so check out WSU's schedule of courses on-line at www.wichita.edu/schedule or call 316-978-3090 to get a copy by mail and to find out how you can register on-line.

BILL | State legislators face 8-day deadline to balance budget plan things we proposed might come back in. Various items could come back."

Sue Peterson, assistant to the president and director of government relations, said the legislature likely will go back to accounting maneuvers and budget shifts.

"They're trying to find the right mix of proposals that would fit the budget," she said. "Any proposal that does not require a budget cut and can pass is a good proposal. Whatever doesn't require a budget reduction is the best bet."

But when will legislators have an answer to state budget woes?

Carlin said that although House leaders originally had hoped to conclude the session this weekend, legislators have about eight days to end their debate and choose a budget-balancing plan.

"We hoped we would have something by the end of the weekend, but right now, we still haven't passed any revenue package," she said Thursday.

"We have not voted on a revenue plan yet. The governor has a revenue plan, House leadership has a revenue plan, and some elements of the freshman plan may come through, but we don't know yet," Carlin said.

"We can get through this year using either the governor's plan or the Republican's plan, but we won't be able to enhance funding that would have removed the waiting list for SRS and elderly, disabled, and we won't be able to increase funding for K-12 or higher education."

BANFIELD | Landon lecturer criticized for controversial message

choose her words more carefully in the future."

NBC could not be reached for comment.

Charles Reagan, chair of the Landon Lecture Series, said he has received calls from media across the country about the lecture.

"Some people loved it, and some people have said, 'How dare you have someone speak who criticizes the war,'" he said.

This isn't the first Landon Lecture that has caused controversy, though, Reagan said. He said that on average, one lecture per year causes controversy or criticism.

It should serve as a reminder, he said, of how prestigious the Landon Lecture Series is.

"We bring the top policy makers in government and journalists who cover them, and so yes, some are controversial," Reagan said.

In her speech, Banfield criticized the news media, including NBC, for not showing the true horrors of war.

"So was this journalism, or was this coverage? There is a grand difference between journalism and coverage, and getting access does not mean you're getting the story. It just means you're getting one more arm or leg of the story. And that's what we got, and it was a glorious, wonderful picture that had a lot of people watching and a lot of advertisers excited about cable news," Banfield said.

"But it wasn't journalism, because I'm not sure that we in America are hesitant to do this again, to fight another war, because it looked like a glorious and courageous and so successful terrific endeavor."

Reagan said it was very interesting to hear someone in the business offer a critique of their own business.

And regardless of whether people agreed with her position, he said, the speech was honest and insightful.

"She was basically having a conversation with the audience," Reagan said.

"She was very open, and she wasn't guarded. I think that was a lesson that she learned, though. If you are going to be critical, maybe you need to rehearse it and be prepared."

Reagan pointed out, however, that many of the people criticizing her lecture were taking only sentences or paragraphs of the lecture to form their opinions from.

Others, who didn't read or hear the lecture, are getting information from a story written about the lecture, he said.

He said he thinks many people are ignoring the fact that Banfield did praise NBC for never censoring her and allowing her to report on the Arab point of view.

Banfield also criticized TV audiences for being more interested in murders and missing children than international relations.

"It's crucial to our security that you are interested in this," she said.

"Because when you are interested, I can respond. If I put this on right now, you'll turn it off."

Todd Simon, director of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism, said he agreed with a lot of what Banfield said.

He said he looked to many news services outside of the United States for war coverage, because American news media were not showing all sides of what was going on.

"It was nervy, what she did. I don't see anything unethical about it, though," Simon said. "Her criticism is what a number of us here have been thinking."

Programs extend to southwest

Western community colleges, 3 state universities partner

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Southwest and western Kansas residents will have more educational opportunities beginning this fall, thanks to a partnership among three state universities and several community colleges.

Representatives from K-State, Fort Hays State University and Emporia State University have helped develop the Southwest Kansas Access Group — a task force designed to increase the number of southwest Kansas students in undergraduate courses.

Provost James Coffman said the Board of Regents appointed the task force in June 2002 to study access to higher education in the region. After several meetings and testimonials from residents in the region, the board passed the group's plan to extend classes at Barton County, Dodge City, Garden City, Pratt and Seaward County community colleges.

"Right now, higher education just isn't accessible in that area," he said. "This is a huge advancement for southwest Kansas."

Richard Burke, president of Dodge City Community College, agreed.

"If you divide the state into four, and draw a circle 60 miles around Topeka, you'll encompass the Board of Regents, Kansas State, Emporia State, the University of Kansas and Washburn — all in the northeast quadrant of Kansas," he said. "The southeast quadrant includes Emporia, Pittsburg State and Wichita State. The Construction to close Poyntz over summer months

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Construction on Poyntz Avenue between 17th Street and Sunset Avenue is set to begin June 1 and should be completed during the fall.

There are several underground springs beneath the pavement that have created voids in the sub-grade. In addition, continual overlays have reduced the height of the street's curbs from the original six inches to less than three. Ineffective gutters and the steep grade of the street has made proper drainage nearly impossible.

To fix the problem, city engineer Jeff Hancock said, the entire roadway will have to be removed. Crews will install a drainable base that will allow water from the springs to escape while still supporting the roadway.

It was first plotted in 1858, three years after the city of Manhattan was founded. The road was improved into a paved surface during the 1930s, but no significant changes have been made to it in the past 70 years.

This section of pavement has required intense levels of maintenance from city road crews. During the past 10 years, the city has spent $40,000 on patches and asphalt overlays to keep the road serviceable.

Hancock said the measures haven't been successful in stabilizing the street because the sub-grade, on which the street is based, has failed. Hancock said the base hasn't provided an adequate amount of drainage and, as a result, there has been a high amount of erosion of both the surface material and its base.

"The project will probably be done by the end of October, barring any extended periods of bad weather," Hancock said.

Hancock said construction will begin at the intersection of Poyntz and Sunset, so that section will be

Kansas runners cross state to help MDA

By Tina Deines
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Ten Kansas runners ran from Nebraska to Oklahoma this weekend to raise money for the Muscular Dystrophy Association.

The 217-mile run started at 7:15 a.m. Saturday and ended at 4:15 p.m. Sunday, with each of the 10 runners contributing an average of 26 miles in five-mile intervals.

Brianna Hooks, junior in accounting, said one of the highlights was having an MD patient cheering for her and the other runners near Haysville.

"Just kind of putting a face to a cause always helps," Hooks said. "It just really makes you push even harder to know that you can do it."

Bryan Cless, senior in mechanical engineering, agreed.

"You see what you're running for," he said. "She can't obviously do what we do, so it makes it more special."

Steve Cless, K-State graduate and Bryan's father, said having the patient there helped the runners appreciate the cause more.

"You really get a lot of appreciation of what they have to do every day," Steve said. "It just gets reinforced why we're doing this."

Steve has run in this event several times since 1985. Although the run has not taken place for the past few years, Steve said he was glad to participate in it once more.

The Manhattan Farmer's Market is an open air market that operates every Wednesday and Saturday until Oct. 31. Market opens to residents for summer

They were piled in green, yellow and red baskets and tied with blue ribbon, lined up in a row and too perfect to resist.

Or so it would seem as customers, one by one, first glanced quickly and then stopped to buy.

"They can't resist them," Lola Lopez, St. George resident and self-proclaimed taster, said. "There is only one problem with her business — the cookies are so good, people don't know which to choose."

That problem seems to be solved as Barbara Jones, owner of Nell's Sweets and Things, tells customers they can buy one pack for $2.50, or, if they can't decide, three packs for $6.

"It almost always works," said Jones, a retired Manhattan High School teacher. "You can never have too many cookies, so the three packs for $6 is too perfect."

And her philosophy seems right, as several of the nine types of homemade jumbo cookies were sold out by 10 a.m. Saturday at the Fresh rhubarb and asparagus are just two of many produce products that can be purchased at Manhattan Farmer's Market.

Farmer's Market, located at 5th and Humboldt.

Beginning a summer of tradition, vendors lined the parking lot with all types of goodies — plants, flowers, baked goods, produce, pet treats, crafts and specialty items — and they will continue every Saturday from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. until the last weekend in October.

Jones, who is starting her seventh summer at the Farmer's Market, said business was good for opening day, even though she expects it to pick up as the season progresses.

"We always run out by the end of the day," she said of the jumbo cookies and breads that fill her booth. "Which we love because we don't have to take it home and eat it."

Though she claims the cookies sell out, one wonders as she pays her help, Moriah Lane, 6, with a pack of chewy chocolate cookies.

Kansas City metropolitan area hit by twister; at least one dead

A series of tornadoes pummeled Kansas and Missouri on Sunday, flattening buildings and killing at least one person as they left a swath of destruction a quarter-mile wide in some places. The tornadoes were part of a large storm system that hit the Midwest, spawning twisters in South Dakota and Nebraska as well.

Bush says banned weapons will be found in Iraq

President Bush said Saturday it is a matter of when — not if — weapons of mass destruction will be found in Iraq. Other U.S. officials said weapons were destroyed before or during the U.S.-led war.

Planetarium names asteroid in honor of famed children's TV show personality

PITTSBURGH — Mister Rogers now has an asteroid named in his honor. "Misterogers," an asteroid formerly known as No. 26858, honors Fred Rogers, creator and host of public television's "Mister Rogers' Neighborhood." Rogers died Feb. 27 at age 74.

"I doubt that there are many who have not been touched in some way by the life and work of Fred Rogers," said John G. Radzilowicz, director of the Henry Buhl Jr. Planetarium & Observatory at the Carnegie Science Center, which made the announcement Thursday.

The science center worked with Family Communications Inc., the production company Rogers founded, to produce a planetarium show for preschoolers called "The Sky Above Mister Rogers' Neighborhood." The show now plays at 15 planetariums across the country.

"Misterogers" can be found between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, and is about 218 million miles from the sun, which it takes about 3 1/2 years to orbit. It was discovered in 1993 by E.F. Helin at the Palomar Observatory in California.

The International Astronomical Union names comets, asteroids and surface features such as moon craters after individuals. The honors cannot be bought, and they are based on merits judged by the astronomers.

Prince William to study in America

LONDON — Prince William wants to spend a few years in New York after finishing his university degree, a British newspaper reported Sunday.

William, 20, wants to pursue a postgraduate degree at an American college or a job with a U.S. art auction house or gallery, The Sunday Mirror said.

"William is determined to maintain a degree of anonymity and feels America offers him the best chance of that," a courtier at Buckingham Palace told the newspaper. "Various options are being discussed. It would be for a year or perhaps two."

A spokesman for St. James' Palace did not deny the report but said no decisions about William's future have been made.

"He has two years left at university. Anything about what he might do then is pure speculation," the spokesman said on customary condition of anonymity.

Jewell wins country music contest

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — Buddy Jewell, a man who's no stranger to the way Music City works, secured a record deal Saturday night by winning the "Nashville Star" talent competition.

"Aside from the times my babies were born and I married my wife, this is the greatest," Jewell said from the stage of the Acuff Theatre after winning the competition.

Jewell, 41, who's been singing demos for songwriters for a decade in Nashville, beat out 10 other finalists in the USA Network series.

Jewell, a native of Osceola, Ark., earned a Sony Music recording contract. Country artist Clint Black will produce Jewell's debut CD.

Jewell and 11 other aspiring country stars moved into a house on Nashville's Music Row in early March and lived there for nine weeks.

While there, they competed in weekly talent shows.

Viewers voted by telephone or the Internet after each show, sending the contestant with the least votes home.

Stories written by King as student become collectors items

LISBON FALLS, Maine — Copies of the Lisbon High School student newspaper from the mid-1960s have become collectors items.

That's because they contain two original stories by an author listed as "Steve King."

The stories, "The 43rd Dream" and "Code Name: Mousetrap," are believed to be among the earliest published works of best seller Stephen King, who grew up in Durham and attended Lisbon High at that time.

The old newspaper copies were discovered last year when retired English teacher Prudence Grant cleaned out her file cabinet.

She sold the copies on the online auction site eBay, where they fetched $400 to $800 per copy.

Grant never had King in class, but she was an adviser for the school newspaper, The Drum.

KSU Young Democrats receive awards, elected to positions

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

KSU Young Democrats was named Kansas chapter of the year for the second year in a row.

"We're thrilled," said Christine Baker, secretary of the chapter and junior in political science. "At the state convention, our president got to stand up and talk about our chapter's success. It was exciting for us to get to tell other people how we do things here."

Baker said K-State's chapter received the award for its successes in local political campaigns.

"We helped in getting Sydney Carlin elected. We also helped in Kathleen Sebelius' campaign," she said.

Joel Mease, junior in political science, said he was pleased with the group's efforts in those political campaigns.

"We're pretty excited with the results of the elections, and I'm excited we received the award again," he said. "I'm excited about the opportunity to build the democrat party for the future."

Baker said the chapter is also successful in recruiting new members and keeping members.

"Some chapters have difficulty in keeping members," she said. "Everyone in our group works at recruiting new members."

Baker said K-State's chapter has about 40 to 50 members, and it is always looking for more.

"You have to be a democrat and between the ages of 13 to 35," she said.

"If you want to join, you don't have to apply or anything."

Many students join Young Democrats because of the opportunities available, Baker said.

"It helps us establish connections and get experiences," she said. "It helps us with our futures in politics."

Baker said she is one of the few political science majors in K-State's chapter.

"Most students are majoring in other non-political fields," she said. "They just join because it gives them a good background and knowledge of politics."

The chapter meets twice a month, she said.

"We work on fund raising. We get a list of area democrats who may be willing to help us in fund raising and publicity," she said. "We work very heavily on elections - trying to get people registered to vote."

The members also go door-to-door and hand out flyers about political candidates during election time, she said.

"We also have state and national conventions. At the state conventions, all the Kansas chapters get together," she said. "That's where we got the Chapter of the Year award."

Baker said chapters are nominated for the award by other chapters.

"You can nominate your own chapter, I suppose, but I don't think people really do that," she said.

Theater students go to Washington to gain experience, make connections

4 students travel to compete in festival as recognition for their regionals performance

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Networking might be one of the most important aspects of college life.

And it's exactly what Nathan Jackson, Vi Tran, Tiffany Lee and Keenan Ramos, K-State theater students, gained, along with an all-expense paid trip to Washington, D.C., to compete in the Kennedy Center American College Theater Festival.

Because of their outstanding achievements at the regional competition at the University of Northern Iowa, the four students were afforded the opportunity to travel to Washington.

Jackson, the author of "The Mancherios," chose to have his play adjudicated, and it was chosen to be performed at the regional competition.

"The best thing about regionals was how receptive the audience was," he said. "A lot of people came to me and told me that they could relate to the story."

Lee, the play's director, said the crew encountered a few problems at regionals.

"We had to reblock and cut a few scenes because the stage at regionals was one-sided, and the stage at K-State is three-sided," she said.

They overcame the problems, and, from regionals, Lee received a directing fellowship. Jackson received a playwriting fellowship.

Tran said he went to regionals in the theater criticism competition, in which he won and received a fellowship and trip to Washington as well.

"The hardest part about being a critic is to be honest, artful and constructive, but at the same time be truthful," he said. "You hope the reader will interpret it as something worthwhile."

Ramos was chosen as a nominee for the Irene Ryan Award for his performance in "A Cryin' Shame," Kate Anderson, theater director, said.

At regionals, he was a finalist but did not win, she said.

Despite this, the Kennedy Center theater festival national selection team awarded a special acting fellowship to Ramos.

At the national level, all participated, but none received awards.

Jackson said his play itself did not go to nationals, but he went as the author.

"I did playwriting workshops," he said. "I sat in with professionals and discussed what it takes and what you have to go through to be a playwright."

Lee said she directed a 10-minute scene with the student author who had brought it to the competition.

Tran reviewed three plays at nationals, including two original student works.

Like Jackson, Ramos did not compete at the national level, but participated in acting workshops, Anderson said.

Tran and Jackson agreed that the amount of talent at nationals was outstanding.

"The people there were obviously headed toward becoming professionals," Tran said. "They are skilled at what they do and are into furthering the arts."

Jackson said the talent was very concentrated at nationals.

"They were not only good, but very good," Jackson said.

Lee said the Department of Speech Communication, Theatre and Dance has supported the students 100 percent.

"They have been very helpful," she said. "It would not have been possible without them."

TO THE POINT Southwest Kansas outreach program expands options

K-State already boasts programs that allow for distance education experiences away from the Manhattan and Salina campuses.

It's also part of an important partnership between the state's Board of Regents schools and several community colleges called the Southwest Kansas Access Group. With this task force, residents of southwestern Kansas have the opportunity to earn bachelor's degrees at area community colleges.

This is a great option for students, especially non-traditional ones who cannot move away to study at Regents universities. Satellite, computer courses and on-site teachers will be available to help participants earn course credit.

Also, the program will not deplete much of the state's already tight budget. If officials are given $200,000 from legislators, face-to-face instruction will increase. If not, the rest of the program can exist through the tuition and fee money collected from participants.

This program provides another positive way for K-State to share its resources with students who otherwise might not have completed degrees.

You have your choice in Nemaha County: sheep or cousin.

There's a really hot Classy Cat in my expos class. I was wondering if anybody could loan me some balls so that I could ask her out.

What's with the Wichita State ad in our paper? What's next? KU?

I just realized how old I'm getting. I know seven of the couples in the engagement section. In fact, I think I slept with two of the women.

I just read the Collegian, and I saw that my girlfriend is engaged.

Was that President Wefald who was standing in the lawn by his house in the gorilla suit waving at cars as they went by?

The Collegian is like Playboy. I just look at the pictures.

Yeah, so I suppose the frats are celebrating stupidity right now?

Block One girls like to show their boobs.

Welcome to Manhattan, Kansas: sausagefest capital of the world.

I love Lucy. She's so loosey.

So, I just stole a bicycle from the Aggieville Lounge.

Yeah, this is to the girl that organized the orange T-shirt pub crawl: Can you please show us your boobs again? Thank you.

Kansas State equestrian wins second national championship in three years. Can we please have an article in the Collegian now?

I want to marry Ashleigh Banfield. She's so hot.

LIAR, LIAR

Stretching the truth takes on good, bad definitions

ANGEL WILSON

Abraham Lincoln once said, "No man has a good enough memory to make a successful liar." But the mayor of Mount Sterling, Iowa, disagrees with this statement — considering his townspeople have been extremely successful with it.

According to the Associated Press, "acting Mayor Jo Hamlet said he's tired of the exaggerating that comes with stories in the town of 40 residents famous for its hunting and fishing." Although he was only semi-serious when he brought up the possibility of fining liars to the city council, it is considering it. Hamlet is quoted to have said, "We wanted to slow down on this lying. Plus, I'm bored. It's been a long winter. We're going to beat it around. You never know with the city council around here what's going to happen."

The question, aside from the obvious apprehension from lying being made a crime, is how should a liar be punished if found guilty? Would it be up to the jury, or would the judge have to pull rank on this one? What about lawyers? It is no secret that their career revolves around the art of painting pictures with their words.

Is there a chance that this profession could become extinct?

Better yet, could any profession thrive within a lie-free society? What about people involved in politics, government agencies, plastic surgery, marketing, advertising and promotions, media and psychiatry?

Ideally, the small town of Mount Sterling could be on to something. What good has ever come from being dishonest? And for those who attempt to differentiate between little white lies and big, bold-faced ones, are not all sins still sins, no matter the size?

Sure, they keep lovers happy, salespeople employed, psychics' phones ringing and teachers tenured, but really, what are the moral benefits? Elias Canetti believes that "adults find pleasure in deceiving a child. They consider it necessary, but they also enjoy it. The children very quickly figure it out and then practice deception themselves." Taken in this context, are we not systematically encouraging a tradition of lying in those who are not even old enough to know the difference?

But on the other hand, being a liar is sometimes confused with being tactful. Merriam-Webster defines tact as "a keen sense of what to do or say in order to maintain good relations with others or avoid offense."

That's a hard one. Nowhere not to it say to lie, but it also doesn't say don't lie.

There are very fine lines when trying not to offend someone. Considering the fact that what offends A may not offend B, the line remains somewhat gray. You shouldn't be dishonest when a female asks if she looks fat, but you also shouldn't say that you think her stretch marks make her look like a cuddly tiger cub.

You shouldn't be dishonest if a male asks you if he's the best lover you've ever had, but you shouldn't say that drinking a V-8 would have been much more enjoyable.

See? I told you it was a gray line.

Lying is something that differs in definition from person to person and situation to situation. In some cases it makes things better. In some cases it makes things a lot worse. It is never the popular thing to do, but people do it anyway. The funny thing about lying, though, is that it can add or subtract friends, increase or decrease job salaries, strengthen or weaken relationships, heighten or diminish the quality of life.

So to the cook at Buffalo Wild Wings that I promised a shout-out to, sorry — I lied.

Memories, times make columnist's K-State experience great

FLETCHER JACOBS

Dear K-State:

I had written what I called "The Best Column Ever." Some advice from a senior who just hopes he doesn't trip when his name is announced at graduation. Some stories about the time I skipped class to go to Mexico, the swimming pool in our sixth-floor residence hall room and losing both shoes as a freshman carrying the goalpost to Aggieville after the Nebraska game. Shout outs to a Mennonite pig farmer and Russian exchange students. Some serious, thought-provoking moments, too. And, of course, some real wit and humor.

But since beer cans surround me at 4 a.m. (how I write all my columns), I decided to be honest. I don't know what I'm talking about. My memories aren't better or worse than yours. They're just special to me because they're mine.

So I thought I'd talk about you, the university. People think I'm excited to blow out of here soon. While becoming another cog in the wheel of middle management appeals to me, leaving this campus is going to be hard.

things don't change.

They met in the library, which makes every question about if I've met anyone yet that much more fun (pathetic sigh).

I also remember the anger that coursed through my 9-year-old body reading the infamous "worst program ever" article in Sports Illustrated, seeing basketball games at Ahearn Field House and later idolizing Mitch Richmond and Steve Henson.

I've had purple running through my blood long before Coach Bill Snyder came and will have it long after (may lightning not strike me down) he is no longer the coach.

But let's not butter this up. I've had some tough times. You took my scholarship away. You kicked out Coca-Cola. I won't even mention my freshman pot-luck roommate. The budget cuts. The striving to be a bigger and better university that makes you start to lose the charm and community that made you special in the first place.

Of course I also think we should quit watering the grass and sidewalks to try and look like we live in Pennsylvania. Let the native, tall-grass come back and embrace our environment (remember, I've been drinking).

But I complain because I love. I don't want future K-Stater students like my siblings to have to sit in Pepsi-sponsored lecture classes with Powerpoints sponsored by Varney's Book Store because we need money. Or have to take more online classes because we can't afford to pay faculty. Or go on a campus where everyone is too busy talking on their cell phones to smile at passersby.

Sure, they'll always have several of Rusty's bars to choose from, but there is more to life than that (Editors' Note: The Collegian in no way shares this opinion. No one even likes Fletcher. Go, Rusty's.)

The people here are what make this place great. There is a real feeling that people want to help each other out. I see it in the professors who didn't make me feel like a number when they answered my questions. K-State, you made me challenge every view I've held on politics, religion, society and culture.

I don't know what the future holds. I may end up going back to school, maybe even here, although I doubt it. But no matter where I go or what I do, I will always be a Wildcat. Because when you find a place where it is always happy hour, you don't want to leave.

In a few years, I'm going to get a call from you hitting me up for a donation. And though I may use a fake Spanish accent and claim I've never heard of anyone by the name of Fletcher Jacobs, know that in my heart I'll be humming "Wildcat Victory." I hope the future students here find the same feeling of community I got. And I hope they have as good a time as I did.

Here's to Life,

Fletcher Jacobs

American Heart Walk participants exercise, raise money for association

By Amy Preston
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Skies clouded over and temperatures dropped, but the weather didn't keep a crowd of walkers from having a good time raising funds for the American Heart Association.

Close to 150 walkers from the Manhattan area were at Frank Anneberg Park on Saturday morning to participate in the annual American Heart Walk.

Rod Lumm, director of field operations for the Kansas American Heart Association, said the American Heart Walk is a non-competitive walking event geared toward companies and their employees as a way to increase physical activity while raising funds for the American Heart Association.

Each year, the Heartland Affiliate — which includes six states including Kansas — participate in the walk. The funds raised at these walks help the Heart Association fight cardiovascular diseases.

"This is the fastest growing fund-raiser," Lumm said. "It's a walking atmosphere about physical activity and hopefully leads to a lifestyle change."

Lumm said that corporate teams are asked to raise money, and prizes are awarded to individuals and teams for the amount of funds raised. In addition, Lumm said, 75 percent of the money raised in Kansas stays in the state to fund research grants at K-State and the University of Kansas Medical Center.

Before the event began, Steve Shields, chairman of the event and executive director of Meadowlark Hills retirement community, sent the walkers — a majority of employees and residents of the retirement center — off with positive news.

"I think we doubled the amount we raised from last year," Shields said. "I feel really good about that."

Lumm said this year's goal was $30,000, and as far as he knew, close to $8,000 was raised through corporate sponsorships already. The final total, he said, would not be tabulated until the coming weeks.

"The turnout is not bad,"

Lumm said. "We're hoping to increase from year to year."

Jane Anderson, employee at Meadowlark Hills, said she and her co-workers and Meadowlark residents decided to come out for support.

"We were encouraged as a community to come out and support this," she said. "Heart disease is the number one killer."

On a personal note, the walk also gave Anderson the chance to express her feelings on the disease that kills thousands of Americans each year.

"My dad died of heart disease," she said. "Heart disease will definitely affect someone in your family — the chances are extremely good. This gives the chance for the community to help."

northwest quadrant has Fort Hays State, but there are no state-funded regents institutions in the southwest quadrant.

Burke said the plan will target Hispanic and minority populations in the region.

"That's a major targeted audience," he said. "Dodge City, Garden and Liberal — those three cities, called the golden triangle in southwest Kansas — are cities where the Hispanic population is over 50 percent. These people need opportunities. This program will give it to them."

Coffman said the program will allow K-State to increase its interaction with the region's Hispanic community.

"Expanding their access to K-State is one of our primary objectives," he said.

Betty Stevens, associate dean of distance education, said recent immigrant populations haven't been involved in higher education as much as previous generations.

"Representatives in local areas feel very strongly that they want the new generations of immigrants to contribute as much as they can to the local economy and growth of the region," she said. "Education is an important part of that."

Stevens said the university will bring courses to students who cannot relocate to complete their degrees.

"It's to accommodate the needs of the students who cannot move away from Dodge City to go to colleges. We're thinking in terms of adult students that have ties to the community and can't up and leave," she said. "The universities will provide all of the coursework necessary for the bachelor's programs while enhancing the partnership between community colleges and universities."

Coffman said the plan will extend K-State, Fort Hays State and Emporia State classes to community colleges through satellite, computer technology and some face-to-face instruction.

"K-State's presence in Dodge will primarily be distance learning," he said. "Emporia is intending to provide some face-to-face instruction, and Fort Hays is going to expand its presence in the area. The quality will be the same as our distance education programs anywhere," he said.

The program operates with the tuition and fee money students pay, Burke said. However, face-to-face instruction means higher costs. Therefore, the board plans to ask state legislators for an additional $200,000 annually, beginning July 2004, to help cover instructors' salaries.

"Whether the Legislature gives the regents the money or not, some face-to-face instruction will start this fall. However, the money is meant to expand face-to-face," he said. "Even if the Legislature doesn't earmark the money, the program will start this fall."

Regardless of funding, Burke said the program will also include on-site university representatives from K-State, Fort Hays State and possibly Emporia State.

"It is the intent of Fort Hays State, K-State and Emporia to hire a full-time person who will be the respective university coordinator, housed on the campus of Dodge City Community College," he said.

"For example, the K-State site manager at Dodge will coordinate K-State classes, conduct admissions counseling and complete preliminary transcript analysis to assist students in defining program goals."

Coffman said the site coordinator at the Dodge City site will serve the entire southwest region and play a similar role as the site coordinator currently at the Barton County campus.

"We're basically taking the Barton County model and moving it to Dodge with the expanded purpose of coordination with Colby, Garden City, Liberal, Seward County and Pratt," he said.

"The person on the Dodge City campus will likely be Hispanic and fluent in Spanish so they can better relate to people coming in."

Jennifer Dunn, K-State's affiliate site manager at Barton, said site managers can help place-bound students finish their bachelor's and master's degrees without ever leaving campus.

"Community colleges like Barton County can provide those first two years of a quality undergraduate degree, and they can do so very economically, while K-state can provide the upper-level courses for a bachelor's degree as well as coursework for a master's degree," she said.

Burke said he was happy to see progress in the area.

"I've worked for two years to try to expand offerings for students in the southwest quadrant, and I'm delighted," he said.

"This is all about students — this isn't about colleges and universities."

open when classes start at Manhattan High School's West Campus.

This intersection will feature the only significant change to the overall design of the street. The intersection will be redone as a typical intersection where the streets meet at a 90-degree angle.

The streets currently meet at a 60-degree angle, which has created problems for motorists checking for oncoming traffic.

"It's a safety improvement that will improve visibility in the intersection," Hancock said.

Hancock said both lanes of the street will be closed during construction, but there won't be an established detour.

He said drivers will have to use side streets to bypass the construction zone, but he doesn't expect this to pose a problem.

"There's not a whole lot of through traffic," Hancock said. "The average daily number of vehicles that use the street don't warrant an official detour."

Varsity 4 boat highlights Cats at Big 12 Invitational

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One of the fastest varsity four races of the season wasn't enough to help K-State glide past Texas at the Big 12 Invitational at Burcham Park in Lawrence on Saturday.

However, it did help the Wildcats squeeze past KU to take second in the third-annual regatta.

"We made a really solid statement in the varsity four," Coach Jenny Hale said. "I thought they still had more speed to show, and I think they can take Texas at centrals."

The Cats finished less than four seconds behind Texas, cutting nearly 25 seconds off the margin Texas maintained in the spring's first regatta, the Longhorn Invitational on March 21.

Such vast improvement was limited to the varsity four boat, however.

"The second varsity eight just did not have a good race," Hale said. "There's not a lot they can take from that race feeling particularly good about."

The same story was true in the first varsity eights, where Hale said a strong move by Texas flustered the Wildcats.

"They raced well for about 800 meters," Hale said. "Texas took a pretty good move before the thousand, and they just didn't handle it well. It got them a little nervous, and the rhythm changed. If the rhythm gets off, they start to pull against each other."

Texas put its boat on cruise control the rest of the way en route to a 17-second win.

The nationally ranked Longhorns were heavily favored entering the weekend and they lived up to that billing by winning all but one race and amassing 55 points. With 43 points, K-State held off KU by three to take second.

Drake, Baylor and Tulsa also competed despite not being varsity programs.

"We obviously feel good about how we raced Kansas," Hale said, "but the goal was to have raced Texas a little tighter."

Big 12 Invitational Results

1. Texas	55
2. K-State	43
3. Kansas	40

Beating the Jayhawks on its home water remains gratifying for K-State. Kansas played the spoiler at the Wildcats' 40th-anniversary celebration by winning the Kansas Cup on Tuttle Creek Reservoir on April 19.

The Wildcats now will take a week off from competition and return to the water at the Lexus Central/South Division Sprints in Oak Ridge, Tenn., May 17-18. The Sprints is the qualifier for the NCAA Championships, May 19-June 1, in Indianapolis.

K-State was trying to improve its seeding for the sprints by challenging Texas at the Big 12 Invitational. Except for the varsity four, Hale said K-State didn't make that statement.

"You always want to improve your seeding," Hale said. "Except for the varsity four, we didn't do that."

So the Wildcats will assume the role of underdog heading to Tennessee. With two weeks to prepare, the season's greatest challenge begins, Hale said.

"We're at the point where there's not a lot to gain in strength," she said. "The next two weeks are really psychological."

Baseball's road losing streak reaches 15

Baylor sweeps Cats in 3 games, sticks K-State with 12 conference losses

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Coach Mike Clark glanced at the statistics before K-State's weekend series with Baylor, the Bears' 5.48 team ERA seemed out of place.

Against K-State (12-13, 2-19), however, Baylor (34-17, 14-10) made clear its pitching staff was anything but a weakness.

The Bears surrendered just 16 hits and four runs on way to sweeping the Cats in three games to extend K-State's road-losing streak to 15 straight, including 12 in a row in conference play.

"The surprise with their pitching is the statistics they have. Out of their starting pitchers, we only saw one fastball under 90 mph the whole three games," Clark said. "They have outstanding arms. You scratch your head and try to figure out why their ERA is high, but the stuff they have is outstanding."

Baylor lowered its team ERA to 4.58 on Sunday with a 12-2 eight-inning win cut short by the league's run-rule. The Bears also took Saturday's doubleheader 11-1 and 10-1.

"That is as talented a team as any in the country," Clark said.

Before the series, the Bears' offense was the subject of Clark's attention. Baylor's .329 batting average ranked 13th nationally before the Bears banged out 42 hits against the Cats.

"They really swung the bats well," Clark said. "They just put the ball in play and really competed well at the plate. They hit the ball extremely hard, and they're very fundamentally sound. They're as good as advertised."

Jim Ripley, Jonathan Gutierrez and Jared Brite started for K-State, but none would make it past the fourth inning. In Saturday's second game, Gutierrez left after just two outs after giving up eight runs on eight hits.

"It was very disappointing," Clark said. The Wildcat bullpen was only marginally better. No K-State pitcher could keep the Bears off the scoreboard, but Brett Bagley surrendered just one run in 4 1/3 innings of game one relief to lead the reserves.

Clark's club now turns its attention to the season's stretch run with conference series remaining against Oklahoma this weekend and Kansas, May 16-18. With hopes for a Big 12 Tournament appearance all but dashed, K-State will finish 2003 with different goals in mind.

"We're playing for Kansas State pride," Clark said. "We're a pretty beat-down ball club. We've been beaten up, dumped on, drug around, run over and everything else. We're a little short in some areas, and it hurts us. But our kids play hard, and they play with pride, and I know they're going to do that in the remaining games of the season, too."

Team to receive new outdoor track after 15-year wait

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Sometimes it pays to be patient. But don't tell Cliff Rovelto that. The K-State track coach has been patient for 15 years and is still eagerly awaiting the completion of a new outdoor track.

But patience is something with which he has become familiar.

"It will be done when it's done, and without it, we'll make due," Rovelto said.

elto said.

He has watched and waited, and now — at last — his new track is being built.

When he first arrived at K-State for the 1988-89 track season, he watched as workers put the finishing touches on the massive Bramlage Coliseum.

R.V. Christian track, located just southwest of Bramlage and east of Tointon Family Stadium, was in need of construction itself. When it was torn apart last fall, the surface was hard, the facilities run down, and it couldn't play host to a meet.

In 1992, Rovelto had a view of the football team's new press box and was well aware of the multi-million dollar indoor practice facility constructed next door to the track.

Rovelto was training 31 All-Americans in deteriorating facilities while Coach Mike Clark's baseball stadium was refurbished and rededicated.

He was there in 1998 when KSU Stadium had to have a new upper deck, and he witnessed the construction in 2001 that replaced the stadium's turf.

While the university was busy surrounding Rovelto's track with new facilities and million-dollar investments, he trained on.

And he was successful.

He is the only K-State coach ever to have won a Big 12 title. He did it twice, winning back-to-back women's Wild coaches have lost respect but should not lose jobs

Some time between John Wooden and now, coaches have gone wild.

If it were a video, it wouldn't be as popular as the alternative choice in "gone wild" videos, but I know two coaches who would have made an appearance in it last week.

Apparently, bone-headed moves are key ingredients to being a good coach these days.

Only a few days apart last week, two Division I coaches were reprimanded for committing some silly acts.

One happened to be in the Big 12 — in Ames, Iowa.

Larry Eustachy, Iowa State men's basketball coach, decided to kill a few beers at a party in Columbia, Mo., after losing to the Tigers. For the hot-headed coach, it was all fun and games until a little punk found his digital camera and sold pictures to The Des Moines Register.

But just because he decided to throw a few back and kiss a chubby female student, should he lose his job? I'm sure there are plenty of Iowans in high management positions who have done much worse.

He should return next season, and if he screws up again — then they should can him. Don't be hasty.

The next act of stupidity came out of Tuscaloosa, Ala. University of Alabama football coach Mike Price went to a topless bar and dropped a few bucks — no big deal. It happens every day in the United States.

The rest of the night is where all the problems arose.

The talented dancer Price was drooling over — not to mention pinching and winking — came back to his hotel room and proceeded to run the room service bill to more than $1,000.

It's funny how they treat you, isn't it, Mike? You think they're into you. There's no way your wife and kids will ever find out. Then she takes your money — a lot of your money.

Price got the ax Saturday afternoon before ever coaching a game for the Crimson Tide, but did he deserve it?

His wife probably wanted to ax him in more places than one, but she didn't. She sat by his side at the press conference and bit her tongue while he told the story of his crazy night with a stripper named "Raven" or "Destiny" to the 'Bama nation.

For the hot-headed coach, it was all fun and games until a little punk found his digital camera and sold pictures to the Des Moines Register.

Their wives should kick these slimeballs to the curb, but for them to lose their jobs is a different story.

Every guy makes mistakes. Some have a disease. Eustachy says he is an alcoholic. Some guys are just horny and go look at dancing women all night.

Note of that looks good on a résumé, but is it an offense worthy of termination? That's why athletic directors get paid what they do. They do what people tell them and make rich boosters happy.

Alabama may have made a huge mistake. When a new coach is named, it will be the Crimson Tide's third in less than five months. Great stability. Way to show players and the country you know whom you're hiring.

Fans continue to pledge their loyalty to Bobby Knight. How does a guy like Knight keep a job? He has physically attacked, screamed at and called players and fans every name in the book, and yet he is a coaching legend. Anything pulled from Knight's mile-long record is far worse than anything Eustachy or Price did.

These guys have lost all respect, and dumb as they may be, they've never had any serious offenses in the past. Eustachy's fate has yet to be decided, but most signs point to the door for the coach who never wears a tie.

Go wild, coaches. Everyone seems to have cameras these days.

Low-carb diets can be beneficial if closely followed

By Wendy Gorman
 KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

With summer and the days of diminished clothing looming ahead, body anxiety can begin to set in. People want to look their best and seek a quick fix to extra winter pounds.

Enter fad diets. "The number one reason is instant gratification," said Dianna Schalles, health educator and nutritionist at Lafene Health Center.

Among the wide array of crash diets to follow, the low-carbohydrate/high-protein variety is the most widespread.

"The biggest one is the Atkins diet. It had slowed down, but I notice now it's picking up quite a bit," said Jack Steel, owner of General Nutrition Center at Manhattan Town Center.

Despite the recent ubiquity of high-protein diets, Schalles said they have been around for a while.

"These really are not anything new. They've been around for decades."

Low-carbohydrate diets may have enjoyed such longevity because of their ability to cut pounds quickly, said Schalles, but not because of any innovative science.

"On a low-carb diet, you're really on a low-calorie diet," Schalles said. "You're restricting calories, so the bottom line is, you're going to lose weight."

Steel observed varying degrees of success among those who purchase Atkins products such as shakes and bars.

"Some people it works really well for, and others it doesn't," Steel said. "I've noticed people that need to lose a lot of weight, it works great for."

"I guess the more weight you have to lose, the better it works."

The speed with which the pounds fly off has its drawbacks, however.

"It's not necessarily body fat a person is losing, but body fluids," Schalles said.

Schalles said carbohydrates are largely composed of water, so when they are drastically reduced in a person's diet, the result is a loss of fluid. Low-carbohydrate diets can result in dehydration.

Other health problems can stem from high-protein diets that encourage consumption of foods high in fat, such as eggs and bacon.

"That can cause high cholesterol and heart disease," Schalles said.

Nutritionists also caution against cutting carbohydrates because carbohydrate-rich foods provide many important nutrients.

"The carbohydrate foods are fruits and vegetables and whole grains, and they have a unique set of nutrients that they can't get from protein foods, like meat and dairy products," said Mary Meck Higgins, associate professor of Human Nutrition and K-State Research and Extension nutrition specialist.

"And we've been hearing a lot lately about benefits of fiber, phytochemicals and antioxidants, and those nutrients tend to be found in high-carbohydrate foods like fruits and vegetables and whole grains," Higgins said.

Schalles said there are thousands of kinds of antioxidants and phytochemicals that haven't been discovered yet, making it impossible to reproduce accurately in pill form.

"Food is the best place to get these things," Schalles said.

The list of health problems associated with high-protein, low-carbohydrate diets include osteoporosis, constipation, headaches, lightheadedness, bad breath and irritability, Schalles said.

Pregnant women restricting carbohydrates risk fetal death and birth defects. For diabetics, following a low-carbohydrate diet may result in death.

However, Schalles said, some people who are frustrated by unsuccessful attempts at weight loss might benefit from an adaptation of a high-protein diet.

"If we can repackage it in a way that makes it doable for a person, that's better than them not even trying any lifestyle changes," Schalles said.

"If people choose high protein, I would suggest they choose the kind that would be lower in saturated fats," Higgins said.

Higgins suggested including foods such as dried beans, garbanzo beans and black beans. Schalles said some other healthy sources of protein are salmon, tuna, nuts and olive and canola oils.

Schalles said that high-protein diets do have the positive effect of reducing the amount of refined carbohydrates people eat, such as sweets and sugared beverages. Higgins also said that whole foods are good sources of carbohydrates.

"If you think about apples, a fresh apple has a lot more fiber and fills you up more for the number of calories compared to something like apple sauce or apple juice," Higgins said.

"With grains, it's similar, where you have more fiber and nutrients in whole grains, so it's more satisfying for the number of calories you've consumed."

Schalles said the food pyramid remains the best-supported plan for eating, according to scientific research. She said 55 to 65 percent of calories should come from carbohydrates. According to the National Academy of Sciences, some low-carbohydrate diets call for roughly one-sixth the amount people need.

Higgins said moderation is key, and it is best to eat a variety of foods.

"I wouldn't go overboard on anything. We need them all, and a balance is the best way to treat your body," Higgins said.

Dixie Chicks fans cheer at first U.S. concert since controversial remarks

A sold-out crowd cheered, clapped, danced and sang along during the Dixie Chicks' summer tour kick-off concert, showing little concern for the controversy that has surrounded the band since a member criticized President Bush over the war with Iraq.

The show marked the first time the group has performed in the United States since lead singer Natalie Maines told a London audience on March 10: "Just so you know, we're ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas."

The comment was made as war was looming with Iraq, and Maines later apologized. But her remarks brought the group a flood of criticism and media attention, and dozens of reporters came to Thursday's show to see if fans would hold the remarks against the group.

'The West Wing' creator Aaron Sorkin leaving series due to tensions

Saying it's time to take on new challenges, Aaron Sorkin has announced he is leaving NBC's "The West Wing," the Emmy-winning White House drama he created four years ago.

There have been reports of tension between Sorkin and the studio that produces the show, Warner Bros. Television, with Sorkin reportedly cautioned about budgets and production delays. But there was no mention of that from either side following Thursday's announcement.

Waiting for the phone call to tell whether their show is dead or alive

This is the week that Jon Beckerman and Rob Burnett, executive producers of NBC's "Ed," find out if their creation died with a kiss or whether the romance will continue.

Starting May 12, networks announce their schedules for the fall. Producers of hits like "CSI: Crime Scene Investigation," "Friends" or "American Idol" have nothing to worry about. They've already been renewed.

But for shows on the bubble like "Ed," "The Practice," "Becker," "Boomerang" and "Hack," there's genuine suspense.

THE FOUR BIGGEST DIETING MISTAKES

By Rick Tague, M.D., M.P.H.
Board Certified in Medical Weight Management

If you made a New Year's resolution to lose weight but have struggled...or have already failed...you are not alone.

Numerous studies show that over 96% of all self-imposed diets fail to bring about a significant long-term weight loss. Regardless of how much willpower you have, the odds are against you when dieting on your own. And with less than a 4% chance of long-term success, you may ask, "why even try?"

Fortunately, a medical specialty called bariatric medicine has discovered simple, easy-to-follow solutions to the four biggest dieting mistakes. The biggest dieting mistakes are:

1. Using a "cookie cutter" approach to choosing your diet. I call this the "one size fits all" diet. No one gains weight, or loses weight, the same way. In order to be successful your program must be individualized around your personal needs, your likes and dislikes, your medical needs, your family history, your environment, your level of stress and more. Unfortunately, fad diets call for everyone to follow the same diet forever which accounts for such a dismal success rate.

2. No medical monitoring of your weight loss. This may lead to losing muscle and even bone versus losing body fat. Losing muscle causes your metabolism to slow down and contributes greatly to eventual weight regain and makes losing weight "the next time" even more difficult. Weight loss must be medically monitored to insure that what you are eating - how often and at what times during the day - causes you to melt away fat...not muscle.

3. Attempting to fight the "cravings battle" alone. Let's face it, cravings can be an almost impossible "enemy" to fight. The reason is that cravings are hardwired into your body's natural self-protection system.

Brain chemicals causing cravings is one of the ways your body preserves itself from starvation. Of course changing your eating habits by dieting doesn't mean you are starving, but your body doesn't know that. Fortunately, using an individualized high nutrient program, adjusting meal frequency, and other medical techniques including appetite suppressants (when appropriate and only if needed), can eliminate cravings which then makes losing unwanted fat pounds easy.

4. Not recognizing there may be underlying medical reasons causing your weight gain. Obviously fad diets do not address your individual medical history nor do they evaluate and monitor blood and lab findings that can provide quick answers to your past difficulty with losing weight. A physician specializing in medical weight management is able to identify and correct hormonal imbalances and other medical problems that can be the key to a slimmer you.

Losing weight doesn't have to be an uphill battle, and more than likely past failures haven't been your fault. An individual's genetics, metabolism, medical problems, life stresses and food cravings can make weight loss on your own a very difficult undertaking. Make sure any program you undertake avoids these four common mistakes.

Also, seek a medical doctor who specializes in nutrition and medical weight management. Not all physicians have this specialized training. And if you'd like more information about how you can finally achieve weight loss success, please call my office today at 776-4443 to set up a complimentary office visit.

TRACK | Track to be premier venue in conference

Track Championships.

Over the years, he has coached athletes to excel in his little spot among the construction.

Now, however, it's his turn.

R.V. Christian Track is being entirely rebuilt and, when finished in late May, will be one of the premier venues in the conference, the country and the world, Rovelto said.

"As a training facility, it will be as good as anybody's," he said. "As a meet facility, the surface and the layout and the organization of the track is as good as anyone's."

The new track will be a breath of fresh air for Rovelto's cramped teams.

At the old track, there was only one usable long-jump pit, one pole-vault pit and two shot-put rings. The javelin throwers could throw only one direction without risking "interference" with the high jumpers, and runners warming up were left with few open spaces.

That all will change now, Rovelto said.

"It's going to make practice a lot more fun. We will have more sand pits — there really was only one usable before. Now, if there's no wind, we could use four. We can set up two or three pole-vault pits. We can throw the javelin both directions without interfering with the high jump pit. Now we have an extra jogging lane on the inside of the oval," Rovelto said.

"It is just going to be a lot easier to get work done and a lot safer."

In addition to adding room

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

R.V. Christian Track, located just southwest of Bramlage Coliseum and east of Frank Myers Field at Tointon Family Stadium, was recently reconstructed. Last fall it was torn apart, the surface was hard, the facilities were run down, and it couldn't play host to a meet.

to operate, Rovelto said the new track will make training better. The track will feature several state-of-the-art innovations.

Workers are constructing a 110-meter training lane built to slope. The track actually will have a small incline, allowing runners to work uphill or downhill without having to leave the facility.

"That is very unique," Rovelto said. "There are a few in the world, but the way it is set up, it's the only one I know of in the United States."

But Rovelto's dream isn't ready yet.

When it originally was contracted, it was to be done in September. That fell through as untimely rains and logistical errors held up construction.

"Part of the problem was weather, part of the problem was equipment and part of the problem was just some other logistical things," Rovelto said. "The early fall was pretty wet. It seemed to always be wet when we needed it to be dry."

Then workers hoped to lay the final of three layers in March in order to make the track ready for the outdoor track season.

Rain and cold temperatures pushed that goal back, too. Now, Rovelto said he hopes to have everything ready by the end of May, just in time to miss track season entirely.

He might have to wait for several more months to set foot on his track, but that probably won't bother Rovelto.

Patience is something he's become used to.

"When I took the job, I knew the budget, I knew the resources, and I knew the facilities," he said. "I still thought we could accomplish goals then, and I still do now. It will be done when it's done."

RUN | Students run to benefit muscular dystrophy

"I love to run," Steve said. "What a great combo — an opportunity to do what I love and help others at the same time. The two work very well together."

Muscular dystrophy is a progressive muscle disorder that limits control of muscle function. Bryan said the goal of the run was to raise $550 per runner, which is the amount of money it takes to send one child to MD camp.

"It's a good way to help people out that are less fortunate than I am," Bryan said.

While the three didn't undergo any special training for the event, they each said they pushed a little harder in their everyday running preceding the event.

"I've always been a runner," Bryan said. "I focused more and ran — it was more of a priority."

Steve said that although he has been running since the mid-'70s, he had to step his routine up a bit.

He added, though, keeping a positive attitude is necessary.

"The mental game is important," Steve said. "If you know you can do it, you can do it."

The three said everyone worked together to cheer each other on when he or she was running.

"The camaraderie makes it worthwhile as well as the good cause," Hooks said.

Although they said the event went well, at times it was a challenge to keep going once the adrenaline wore off.

"The first few legs are great," Steve said. "After about the third one, muscles get a little tired."

Bryan said Kansas weather presented a challenge to the runners.

"The hardest part was the wind," Bryan said. "Other than that, it was a pretty good run."

Hooks agreed and added that Kansas hills were also difficult.

Steve said the event was extra special because he got the opportunity to run with his son.

"He followed in my footsteps," Steve said. "It's cool to see him do something I love to do."

The runners said they would like to participate in the run again.

"It was definitely worthwhile," Hooks said. "The abilities you have you can't take for granted."

Bryan said the purpose made the temporary pain worthwhile.

"During the run you're thinking, 'This is the dumbest thing ever,' but when you're in the RV, you realize it's worthwhile and there's a purpose to it," Bryan said. "That's why I'd do it again next year."

MARKET | Local farmers, merchants sell products

"They are my favorite," she says as she opens the package after she sneaks down from her family's booth to help sell cookies. Her parents, Tom and Jennifer Lane, sold products from their business, Honey Lamb Farm.

"We have a little bit of everything," Tom said. "Honey, honey sticks, creams, candles, soaps. We only brought a small sample from our farm today, but as business picks up, will have a bigger booth."

And as for losing one of his workers, Tom just shrugged his shoulders.

"I guess we don't pay her enough," he said. "Cookies will do it every time."

We've got the stories you've got to read.

Need a magic wand to graduate on time?

Well, it may not be magic, but summer school at Wichita State can do some pretty incredible things — like make an entire semester disappear in as little as two weeks. It's not smoke and mirrors, just an easy, convenient way to get in a class or two while you're home between semesters. And as always, credits earned at WSU are easily transferable to K-State. So, take summer school at Wichita State, and in the blink of an eye you'll be closer to graduation and still have plenty of time to enjoy summer before heading back to Manhattan.

Enrollment is now open, so check out WSU's schedule of courses on-line at www.wichita.edu/schedule or call 316-978-3090 to get a copy by mail and to find out how you can register on-line.

Meth lab found in parked car

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A man in a parked car was arrested early Sunday morning after a methamphetamine lab was found in the trunk of his vehicle.

Justin Staley, Ogden, was parked at Bluemont Scenic, near Bluemont Hill Park. A Riley County Police Department officer discovered the vehicle, and officers who have been specially trained in the disassembly of clandestine labs were called to the scene, an RCPD press release said.

Lt. Kurt Moldrup of the RCPD said mobile meth labs are becoming a more prominent way of manufacturing the drug.

"Now they're more common, and probably the most common type," he said.

"The sheer mobility makes it harder to keep track of them."

Despite their growing popularity, mobile meth labs are just as dangerous as others, Moldrup said. The combination of chemicals used in manufacturing methamphetamines is very unstable and often can result in fire or explosions, he said.

Anhydrous ammonia, one of the ingredients in methamphetamines, was the only one absent from the vehicle in which Staley was found, Moldrup said.

The vehicle was identified as being stolen from Riley County earlier this year, the press release said.

The arrest was an isolated incident, Moldrup said, and is not connected with any other arrests or investigations.

Midwest recovering from storms

By Scott Chorton
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

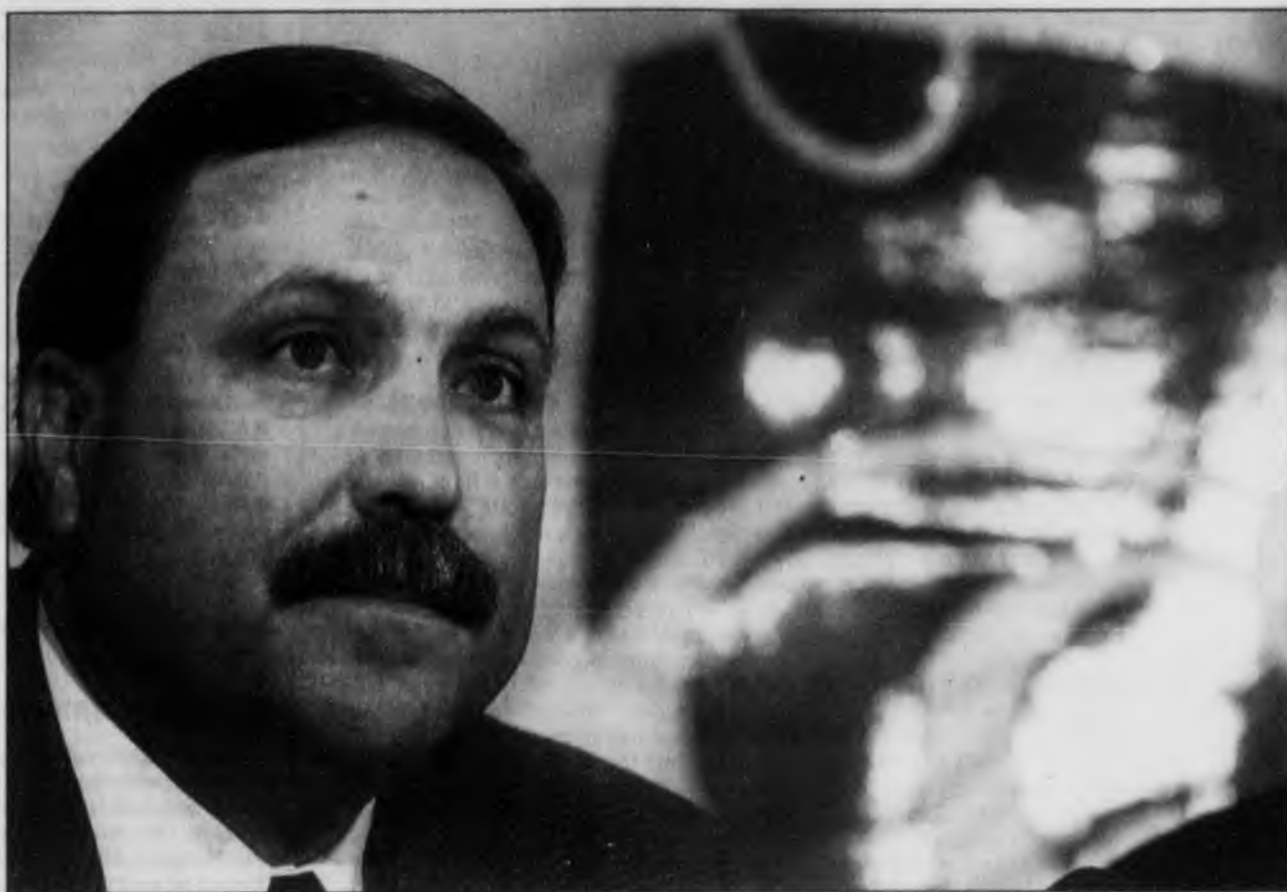

PIERCE CITY, Mo. — Searchers using dogs and heavy equipment went from one crumpled home to another Monday after tornado-packed storms flattened communities in four Midwestern states and killed at least 38 people. Ten people were missing, including eight in this southwestern Missouri town.

It was "the most devastating series of tornadoes we've ever had in the state of Missouri," Gov. Bob Holden said after walking the rubble-strewn streets of Pierce City.

The storms were blamed for at least 18 deaths in Missouri, seven in Kansas and 13 in Tennessee, where a single tornado carved a 65-mile path of destruction. The storms also brought hail and heavy rain; three of the victims drowned trying to drive on a flooded road

Clark calls it quits after 17 seasons

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After 17 seasons, K-State baseball coach Mike Clark's batteries were simply drained.

Clark said as much during an afternoon press conference to announce his resignation at Bramlage Coliseum on Monday.

"I'm proud of what we've accomplished in 17 years," Clark said, "and every day I've woken up proud to represent Kansas State."

Clark, the winningest coach in the history of K-State team sports, will stay on through the rest of the 2003 season before helping athletics director Tim Weiser search for a replacement.

"Mike represents all the right things about intercollegiate athletics," Weiser said. "I'm seated next to a gentleman that has persevered and has paid a dear price for Kansas State baseball. I told the team today I'm not sure we'd even have a baseball program had Mike not been our coach these past 17 years and been willing to fight the many battles he's fought."

This season has been one of the toughest for Clark, the only coach in school history to reach either the 300- or 400-win mark at K-State.

K-State endured its longest losing streak in program history earlier this spring when the Wildcats dropped 16 straight from Dec. 11 to Jan. 11. Clark's club comes into tonight's 7 p.m. contest with Wichita State at Tointon Family Stadium losers of nine in a row.

However, Clark said when he addressed the team before the press conference that K-State's current struggles had little to do with the decision.

"I wanted them to understand this

Coach Mike Clark clears his eye during a press conference Monday during which he announced his resignation effective at the conclusion of this season. His resignation will end a 17-year stint at the head of the Wildcat program.

In Clark's 17 years

Coach Mike Clark remains the winningest coach in K-State history. Here is a glimpse at his career.

1987 — Cats go 28-24 in his first season.

1988 — Senior designated hitter David Chadd becomes first consensus All-American since 1973. The team's 34 wins are Clark's most to date.

1989 — Clark coaches K-State to its 1,000th win. Finishes fifth in Big 8.

1990 — Clark earns conference coach of the year honor. Finishes second in Big 8.

1991 — Clark becomes the winningest coach in K-State history with his 139th win.

1992 — Clark coaches K-State to its 1,100th win with a 7-1 triumph over state rival Kansas on March 21.

1993 — Postseason record Clark drops to 0-4 with two losses in the Big 8 Tournament.

1994 — K-State wins only 13 games.

1995 — K-State collects its first conference tournament win under Clark and finish 2-2.

1996 — Becomes first K-State coach to take the Wildcats to four conference tournaments.

1997 — K-State finishes ninth in its first season in the Big 12. Clark posts 300th win.

1998 — The Wildcats drop to 10th in the Big 12 despite having four All-Big 12 selections.

1999 — Clark finishes a half game behind Oklahoma for the eighth and final spot in the Big 12 Tournament. Sophomore outfielder Kasey Weishaar becomes Clark's fifth All-American.

2000 — Clark tallies his 350th win at K-State and 650th overall.

2001 — The Wildcats finish 1 1/2 games off the pace of eighth-place Iowa State for a spot in the Big 12 Tournament while collecting just five conference wins.

2002 — Makes first Big 12 Tournament appearance. Clark becomes first K-State coach in any sport to post 400 wins. Clark's 700th career win would come against Texas Tech on April 5.

2003 — K-State sets the longest losing streak in school history with 16-straight losses from Dec. 11 to Jan. 11. On May 6, Clark resigns.

Blood donations fluctuate when U.S. experiences difficulties

By Jamie Barrett
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Trish O'Donnell doesn't necessarily feel patriotic when she donates her blood.

She doesn't feel as if she is providing a service to anyone.

And she doesn't really feel like she is doing anything exceptional.

To O'Donnell, junior in mass communications, donating blood is something she would do regardless of whether it was needed. She simply donates because she knows that she should.

"I have just always thought that it was a good thing to do,"

O'Donnell said. "It helps out someone else, and it doesn't hurt me at all."

O'Donnell began donating blood at age 17, the first year she was eligible. In doing so, she joined the thousands of Americans who collectively donate about 15 million units of blood per year.

But intentions aside, O'Donnell's actions may prove more patriotic than she realizes.

In the central plains region of the United States (Kansas and northern Oklahoma), about 500 units of blood are needed each day. In the United States, 38,000 units of blood are needed every day. That figures to about two units of blood needed every second.

Bree Cox, communications specialist for the American Red Cross Central Plains Regional Blood Services, said only 5 percent of the eligible population donate blood in the U.S. yearly. Cox said most of that blood in the Red Cross' supply comes from regular donors, but during times of war and national tragedies, such as the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, blood donations tend to increase.

Cox said when the war with Iraq began, there was an increase in blood donations made in the United States.

Since war developments have begun to cease, Cox said there have been fewer donations being made.

The fluctuation, though, is something that is to be expected, Cox said.

"There is an ebb and flow to the donation pattern," Cox said.

Diane Elder, chief operations officer for the American Red Cross Central Plains Regional Blood Services, said after times of tragedy, donations reach a peak that can be hard to achieve again.

"Looking back on the Gulf War, Oklahoma City bombing, and Sept. 11 attacks, traditionally when we have a national tragedy or disaster there is an increase in donations," Elder said, "but getting them to come back after the need has subsided is challenging."

Although there was a slight increase in blood donation after the war with Iraq began, Cox said the most significant amount of blood donations occurred after Sept. 11.

But, from that blood donated, Cox said only 2 to 3 percent of it was used.

"It was tricky because it was something we had never experienced before," she said.

NEWS OF THE WEIRD

Wall Street Journal reports on recent 'anti-bully' policies

By Chuck Shepherd
UNIVERSAL PRESS SYNDICATE

An April Wall Street Journal report highlighted several states' elementary school "anti-bully" policies that have banned rough-housing, name-calling, and even "mean looks" and pointed gossip, and encouraged teaching the little kids a language of sensitivity and tolerance.

However, one problem some kids fear from such training and language is that, as they move up to middle schools and run into other kids who will be baffled by such sensitivity, the tolerance-trained kids are even more likely to get beaten up.

Readers' choice

A 17-year-old boy lost sight in both eyes in a "potato gun" accident in Denton, Texas, in April.

The "gun" (a length of pipe in which a household explosive is ignited, propelling a potato out the other end, although in this case, it was not a potato but a frog) was being experimented with by several teenagers but failed to fire, and the victim, who had been a mere bystander, stepped up to have a look down the pipe to see what might have gone wrong, just as the gun finally fired.

The continuing crisis

According to an Associated Press report, six candidates for city offices in Charleston, W.Va., misspelled their party affiliations in their official filing forms in January. Among the variations were "Democart," "Democrate," "Repbulican" and "Repucican."

In fact, one of the city council incumbents had, four years earlier, also declared himself to be a "Democart."

In Center Township, Pa., in January, Mark Ferrara called for paramedics when his daughter, 7, couldn't resist trying to lick a frozen metal pole at her school bus stop, and got stuck.

The Rent Stabilization Board of Berkeley, Calif., which regulates residential rates and fights landlord abuses but which is increasingly frustrated by the sky-high cost of local housing, adopted a tactic in February that could not be successful in many places besides Berkeley: It sponsored a "poetry slam" that invited local citizens to rant against the problems of tenants.

The winner of the $100 first prize attacked the "platonic master/slave relationship" and recalled how his last landlord so traumatized him that he "chose to be homeless for nine months just to escape the memory."

Hopeless offenders

Eduardo Rivera, 43, in court awaiting a hearing on a charge of receiving stolen property, was rearrested after he carved his name into a courtroom bench (Reading, Pa., February).

David Joe White Jr., 32, having just pleaded guilty to 42 burglary charges, was rearrested after swiping his lawyer's portable tape recorder from the defense table (Attalla, Ala., February).

Chan Kwok-keung, 34, was sentenced to four months in jail for stealing a court interpreter's purse; he was in the courtroom at the time on theft charges (but had just been cleared) (Hong Kong, March).

More things to worry about

In December, Saskatchewan's Court of Queen's Bench upheld a ruling of the province's human rights commission that four Bible verses (referred to in a newspaper ad) created illegal hate speech because they subjected gay men to "ridicule."

The ad consisted of citations to verses that are considered by many Christians to condemn homosexuality, and a silhouette of two men holding hands, inside the symbol for prohibited behavior (a red circle with a red line through it).

Jeannie M. Patrinos, 32, was sentenced in February to five years' probation for sexual assault. A judge in Lancaster, Wis., found that Patrinos, who was estranged from her husband, broke into his home, climbed into bed with him, and was "having sex" with him, against his will.

The husband's girlfriend was asleep in the same bed, until the man's protests woke her up.

Chutzpah!

In February, Wesley Fitzpatrick applied to a Kansas City, Kan., judge for, and was granted, a temporary restraining order against a female whom he said was stalking him (making him "scared, depressed and in fear for my freedom"). However, the order was rescinded when Fitzpatrick showed up to ask that it be made permanent, in that the "stalker" was actually his parole officer carrying out her lawful supervision.

In fact, Fitzpatrick was immediately arrested for not having met with her. (Temporary restraining orders are usually granted by judges without investigation.)

Smooth responses

Door-to-door salesman Gerald L. Thompson, 19, was arrested in a neighborhood near St. Augustine, Fla., in February after he had become exasperated that no one was buying his magazine subscriptions.

Allegedly, he forcibly prevented one homeowner from closing the front door after refusing to buy, then screamed obscenities, pounded on the door, and refused to stop ringing the doorbell.

Downtown development progresses

By Rogie Dorpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan officials have expressed the need to redevelop the city's downtown district, and planning is in the preliminary stages. The Chamber of Commerce has presented a conceptual plan to City Commissioners, and it was well received, city manager Ron Fehr said.

"It's really just the beginning," Fehr said. "We're just getting started."

Brent Bowman of Brent Bowman & Associates Architects PA has attended more than 30 meetings with Lyle Butler, president and CEO of Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, to see what the city's vision of the redevelopment would include.

He said the consensus vision is to create a mixed-use expansion of downtown, including retail, residential and services and to connect them to the existing downtown.

Bowman said what is being discussed to accomplish this task is a corridor along 4th Street, which would be an extension of downtown retail districts on Poyntz Avenue.

The realization that redevelopment was necessary came when Wal-Mart decided to pursue the construction of a Wal-Mart Supercenter in downtown, Butler said.

As a result, he said downtown traffic became a concern, because Manhattan used to be more industrial in nature. Now the city has become primarily retail and residential, which is the reason the city wants to expand the residential and retail nature of downtown.

Butler said this project is a mixed-use project, which includes retail, office and residential additions.

"It doesn't mean that things have gone wrong, it means things have gone well and we've had a lot of input because so many people are interested, which is what we wanted to achieve," Fehr said.

Bowman has drawn more than 40 conceptual plans in regards to the project.

Fehr said the next step in the project is to have the Chamber of Commerce make a recommendation to city commission to begin the process in considering the Chamber's recommendation of a development and design team.

The Chamber is recommending Dial Reality Corporation as the development team, and Brent Bowman and Associates as the design team. Fehr said it's too early in the process to declare a projected end date, but it will be a multi-year project.

Bowman said he is pleased with the progress on the project.

"It's clearly headed in right direction," he said.

Butler agreed. "It's a project in process," he said. "It's a long term event which will have many stages and steps and we're just at the beginning."

Dry option up to greeks

IFC chooses not to mirror MU system

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The University of Missouri's Interfraternity Council recently decided to require all greek houses be alcohol free by Aug. 1, but K-State officials say a similar policy is not likely here in the near future.

All sororities on campus are alcohol free, and five fraternities also are, said Angie Goodson, assistant adviser of Greek Affairs.

There has been no discussion of a policy banning alcohol in all greek houses, Goodson said.

Jeff Rundle, K-State IFC president, said each fraternity is allowed to decide for itself whether to be dry, which allows no alcohol in the house at any time.

"I think that at some point in the very distant future, national chapters will move toward dry houses," Rundle said. "That is where the trend is headed."

Fraternities on campus are dry for a variety of reasons, Rundle said.

Some were founded as dry houses, while others are required to be by their national chapters. Some, though, are required by their national chapters to be dry, but have gained academic exemption from the rule.

FarmHouse fraternity is one of the dry houses on campus.

Kyle Cott, FarmHouse president, said the prohibition of alcohol was one of the primary reasons he chose FarmHouse.

"The atmosphere makes it more conducive to studying," Cott said. "It's easier to keep a clean house."

Cott said FarmHouse has been the top fraternity in grades for four of the previous five semesters, but said the success might not be directly related to its dry status.

Bill Arck, adviser of Greeks Advocating Mature Management of Alcohol, said implementing a dry rule could increase the amount of irresponsible drinking.

"If it does go dry, people won't stop drinking," he said. "It just pushes them to private parties with less control."

Parties at K-State's greek houses are regulated by requiring that houses register parties at least 48 hours in advance, have designated drivers available and have people monitoring the door so there is some control over who enters the party, said Matt Schwartz, president of Lambda Chi Alpha.

Schwartz said the guidelines are set forth by Greek Affairs' substance abuse policy, but there are additional protections at greek parties.

"One of the intangibles of living in a greek house," Schwartz said, "is having guys watch out for each other. It's an added bit of security to have people watching you."

Although the University of Missouri already is implementing dry rules, Arck said he does not think it will prove successful.

"MU probably will find it's not the best thing for them," he said. "On the national scene, I think it's focused more on financial and legal liability than the actual problem."

Top Iraqi weapons scientist captured

By Pauline Jelinek
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — A top Iraqi scientist has been taken into custody, according to U.S. officials who say they suspect she has information about a banned biological weapons program.

Huda Salih Mahdi Ammash, who has advanced degrees from two U.S. universities, was taken into custody on Sunday, a Defense Department official said. He had no other details about her detention.

With Ammash's detention, 19 of the 55 Iraqis listed as the most wanted by U.S. officials have been reported captured. In a deck of playing cards with photos of the 55 that troops are using to hunt leadership figures, she is the five of hearts and is pictured saluting.

Officials have not yet found any weapons of mass destruction — which the Bush administration cited as justification for the war in Iraq — and have said they need information from Iraqis to help find them.

Other high-ranking Iraqi officials have denied under interrogation that there have been banned chemical or biological weapons programs in recent years.

U.S. intelligence officials said that Ammash, 49, is believed to have played a key role in rebuilding Baghdad's biological weapons capability since the first Persian Gulf War in 1991.

She was born in 1953 in Baghdad, and her father was Salih Magdi Ammash, a former vice president, defense minister and member of the Baath Party's leadership. Saddam Hussein reportedly ordered his execution in 1983.

Ammash was trained by Nassir al-Hindawi, described by United Nations inspectors as the father of Iraq's biological weapons program, officials said.

She has served as president of Iraq's microbiology society and as a dean at the University of Baghdad.

Ammash and al-Hindawi are among Iraq's top weapons scientists. Others include Amir al-Saadi, a chief chemical weapons researcher, and Dr. Rihab Taha, a woman who was dubbed "Dr. Germ" by inspectors. Ammash is the only woman on the most-wanted list.

Ammash is among a new generation of leaders named by Saddam to leading posts within Iraq's Baath party.

Terrorist suspects to be released

By Pauline Jelinek
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Pentagon is preparing to release a dozen or more prisoners from the high-security compound for terrorist suspects in Cuba, possibly including some teenagers.

Some 660 prisoners from 42 countries are held at the Naval base at Guantanamo Bay, many captured during the war against al-Qaeda in Afghanistan. Officials have declined to identify them or their countries or even say exactly how many are held.

An official said Monday that he believed juveniles were among those to be released. News that several boys between the ages of 13 and 16 were among the prisoners drew criticism earlier from human rights groups and a call for their immediate release.

One official said 20 to 30 prisoners would be released from the prison that was opened in January 2002. Another said the number was 12 to 15.

A military official initially told The Associated Press on Monday that 22 prisoners were transferred from the Cuban facility Monday. Later, a more senior Pentagon official said the report was mistaken, and no transfers had taken place.

Defense Department officials denied that the release was the result of a complaint by Secretary of State Colin Powell, who has pressed the Pentagon to move faster in determining the fate of the prisoners at Guantanamo, some of whom have been held a year and a half without charges or access to lawyers. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity.

TO THE POINT Coach Clark's departure one of pure nobility

Mike Clark was here for the best and worst of times.

He coached the Wildcat baseball team to more than 400 wins — more than any other athletic coach in K-State history.

This year, he has struggled through the longest losing streak in K-State history.

He has been honored for his achievements and highly criticized for his failures.

But in the end, Coach Clark has become a staple in K-State's Department of Intercollegiate Athletics. He was not forced out of his job, nor did his team lose confidence in him. Clark made it clear that the team's struggles did not contribute to his decision, but rather he is resigning because he feels he has achieved all there is to achieve in 17 years.

His noble decision to help Athletic Director Tim Weiser recruit a new coach shows his commitment to the team he brought to four conference tournaments — something no other coach had done.

To Coach Clark: it has been one hell of a ride, and K-State sports has gained invaluable knowledge and recognition throughout your tenure as coach of our K-State Wildcats.

CAMPUS FOURUM 395-4444

You know, one of our professors was on the History Channel and I never heard anything about it in the paper. Good job, Collegian. Way to go.

Hale Library. Halle Berry. Any connection? Just think about it.

Guess who just gave me a call. Bachelor number 1, Bachelor number 2 or Bachelor number 3?

Six-toed or not, Nemaha County girls are hot.

Capri pants are like those cars where the interior is everything covered in leopard. They are both the same in the fact that they are both horrible.

There's nothing better than sitting underneath the highway watching a tornado pass by.

Trogdor the Burninator, burning all the peoples as he slashes through cottages.

To the guy who parked in Wefald's driveway so he could smoke his cigarette and talk on his cell phone in the president's lawn: You're stupid.

Angel Wilson: when I read your columns, all I hear is, "Kill kill, kill the white man."

It's been weeks and we still haven't found any weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. You don't suppose Bush lied about that, do you, just so he could start a war to make us forget how abysmal his managing of the economy has been?

K-State? More like K-Stale.

No matter how bad I might screw up in life, I can always rely on my faith in the unconditional forgiveness of Joseph Steingold, attorney at law.

I SWEAR Columnist vows to end offensive banter in writing

PAUL RESTIVO

Dear Diary:

Before I began penning this last entry, I fingered through some of my previous self-absorbed columns. I have one last column to write today. What it should contain?

I've asked around for ideas. Suggestions included things like, "Dude, you gotta give Block One another kick in the pants," or "Just find another minority to offend, and go with it."

But I've been there and done all that.

I hate to spend the last 600 words of my column-writing career offending people. All I ask is just for a little respect and recognition. Readers sometimes think I am a drunken, bumbling idiot. Someone who couldn't possibly have any morals. Someone who does not have the word "ethics" in his vocabulary. Definitely someone who is not capable of erasing sexual thoughts from his mind for a mere 10 minutes.

But it's all false. I have morals. I make ethical decisions for the Collegian as opinion editor. I am capable of erasing sexual thoughts from my mind for ... wait, how long did I say before?

So, diary, I need your help in making sure I do not write a column that will be at all offensive or degrading to any person in any way. To ensure my commitment to writing a column of integrity, I am binding myself to the following oath.

"I, Paul Restivo, do hereby swear that I will abide to the Collegian's code of ethics, thereby restricting all offensive, unethical, advertiser-bashing material — while therefore sacrificing all possibilities of humor.

WHEREAS I will not mention how much my Block One lab teacher has zero tact and is the worst example of a professional the College of Education could have given us,

WHEREAS I will not comment on how, deep down, I really am jealous of John O'Hara,

WHEREAS I will not bash the administration for being tightwadish and not granting me in-state tuition even though I'm 20 minutes from the frickin' border,

WHEREAS I will not tell readers that I am offended when they make comments in the Fourum regarding my ethnicity as Mexican even though I am really Italian,

WHEREAS I will not mention how horny some of the future educators of America are,

WHEREAS I will not make any comments regarding the size of my girlfriend's breasts, even though 90 percent of the time during class, that is what I am thinking about,

WHEREAS I will not tell the Office of Greek Affairs that I think their new adviser is really hot, though I wish she would pick a hair color,

WHEREAS I will not take a stand on anything racial even though I am the Wanksta, regardless of what everyone thinks,

WHEREAS I will not bring up anything regarding the homosexual erotic series "Queer as Folk," which I was introduced to this weekend and, which deep down, was somewhat arousing while at the same time forced a vomit-producing effect in my esophagus,

WHEREAS I will not write the column I was intending to write, which merely stated that I had a crush on my 16-year-old cousin who recently joined the family after my mother's wedding even though the girl looked 20,

WHEREAS I will also not mention how seeing my mother in a wedding dress produced the same effect as the "Queer as Folk" comment,

WHEREAS I will not make any more Nemaha County jokes, even though those guys who wanted to kick my bum at the bars during the pub crawl Friday night convinced me that those from Nemaha County really are at the bottom of the gene pool and should be locked away for life,

WHEREAS I will not accuse

my American Survey teacher of being a sex addict, which came to me after a riveting discussion regarding willie-loving Walt Whitman and lover of "flowers" Emily Dickinson, and WHEREAS all comments in violation of the above "whereases" will result in me leaving the Collegian forever."

Thanks, diary. I know that, with your help, I will have my readers thinking that I have made a 180. A new man. One of integrity. One who has matured into an ethically sound writer.

Oh what the hell. Screw 'em.

Paul has retired from the opinion desk and will return in the fall as the Collegian's editor. God help us all. Send all hate mail and death threats to restivo@k-state.edu.

Busing works for KU; K-State should follow suit

The University of Kansas has one. Why can't we? No, it's not a weakling bird mascot. It's a campus bus system.

If you are not going to Edwards Hall, the KSU Foundation building or you are not handicapped, you don't have any campus transportation options. Students have no choice but to walk, bike, carpool or drive, which means fighting the crowds for those select parking spots on campus.

There are regular complaints about parking, not just tickets, but the lack of spaces and parking pass prices.

As a former resident of University Commons, a fact of which I am not proud, I have experienced the parking situation firsthand.

The parking options seem to be very limited as you cruise through the lots in hopes for any open spot. Most students are not lucky enough to park anywhere within the bounds of campus buildings. They are forced to the outskirts near the Veterinary Medicine buildings or across the street from Memorial Stadium.

Students' cars also line the streets of residential neighborhoods surrounding campus.

Within the campus' bounds, there are the stalkers. They prey on any unsuspecting student that may be walking through a parking lot.

You are followed closely by an idling car until you reach your vehicle. Multiple stalkers can result in a standoff between the two vehicles as the innocent driver pulls out of the parking stall.

Parking on campus is risky, but these problems can be remedied with a simple campus bus system running to a few places in Manhattan with high concentrations of K-State students.

This bus service can be modeled after KU's system, with regular stops at apartment complexes and select campus locations.

With a bus that runs to University Commons alone, many SUVs would be out of campus lots, and the 1.5 spaces they take up would be free for commuters, visitors, faculty or other students forced to drive.

A bus could run to Chase Manhattan apartments, which is another area with a lot of students equating a lot of drivers.

Student workers could easily be hired for bus driver positions with a minimal cost to the university. As much as we hate it, students will work for very little in return.

Students live by a strict schedule of class times, and if the bus is regular enough and consistent, it will be used. Buying a bus pass for a semester is not out of the question, either. Reasonably priced passes would be accepted over the alternative parking pass and tickets that students often receive.

The parking garages may be an answer to the parking woes of students and faculty alike, but a bus system would be ideal for an area like Manhattan.

This city is not very large, and many students remain in high concentrations in different parts of town.

Also, walking to the bus stops would be an option for students not living in the larger off-campus housing.

Maybe now is not the time to implement a structure like this because of budget cuts, but I urge campus administration to consider this for the future. The campus parking situation will run much smoother, and students will be happier when a bus system is in place.

TINY DANCERS

Right: "The teachers! The teachers are dancing!" shout excited dance students as they watch the beginning of the finale of "Just to Dance," during a full dress rehearsal put on by the Washington Dance Studio. The students were preparing for their recital on Saturday afternoon.

Manhattan dance students show off talent in annual spring recital

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGE

Five-year-old Megan Vivieros had her first dance recital last weekend. She wore a pink outfit.

She said she likes her teacher and dancing.

Megan's teacher, Sharron Washington, has been teaching dance for 32 years.

Ronda Vivieros, Megan's mother, said that she likes Megan's teacher, as well.

"She is wonderful — really awesome," she said. "I would recommend her to anyone."

Vivieros said she was really pleased with the outcome of her daughter's first recital and plans to keep her in dance.

"She did really good," she said.

"I think she was more nervous about going to practice than the actual recital."

Before she became a teacher, Washington danced herself, taking it up when she was 4 years old.

"I was a business major, but I also did some freelance choreography for musicals and chorale," she said.

"When the local dance teacher retired, I had people asking me why I didn't start a studio. So I did — that was 32 years ago."

Washington had her annual recital this past weekend.

Washington, owner of the studio, said she has about 300 girls, ranging from 3 to college age, dancing for her.

"We begin practicing for the performance in January," she said. "The fall semester is spent on technical classes."

This year's theme was "Just to Dance."

"The theme is from a poem by Linda Staten," Washington said.

"We used the poem to decide the different songs and styles of dance. We read the poem during an interpretive dance at the beginning of each show."

Washington said the studio is divided between her and her daughter, Jennie Stout, a K-State graduate.

The recital was split into two performances, with Stout's dancers performing Friday and Washington's on Sunday.

Washington still dances, though — she and her daughter started off the grand finale.

Alison Fortney, senior at Manhattan High School and student of Washington's studio for 14 years, said she is sad to leave. She'll graduate in May and attend K-State but will no longer be one of Washington's students.

"I cry all the time," she said. "I've made so many friends."

She said she dances about six days a week and loves it.

"My favorite dance was my solo because I self-choreographed it," she said. "I have wanted to do a solo forever, and this year my dream came true."

The studio also works with K-State, Washington said.

"We have a program with the K-State dance department," she said. "We hire girls that are interested into going into dance education. The first year they work with us, and the second year we give them their own class."

Before a performance, Washington said she gives her girls a pep talk.

"I tell them that I want them to just go out there and perform and really enjoy themselves to show that they have worked really hard," she said.

Washington said her favorite part of teaching is the children.

"I just love the little ones," she said.

"I really enjoy the children — I enjoy their spontaneity and just working with them and watching them progress."

THE FUTURE OF BASEBALL

Shockers look for 7th win over Wildcats

By Ben Fehr
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The baseball team dropped three straight games to No. 28 Baylor last weekend, bringing the Wildcats' losing streak to nine games.

Next for K-State is a 7 p.m. showdown tonight with Wichita State at Tointon Family Stadium.

The Shockers, a team Wildcat outfielder Pat Maloney called "our biggest in-state rival" on March 3, have taken three in a row from the Wildcats.

WSU beat K-State 14-10 on March 26 in Manhattan, 13-2 in Wichita on April 9, and 12-3 last Wednesday in Wichita.

Despite K-State's 2003 record against the Shockers, Coach Mike Clark said Wichita State remains the Wildcats' biggest in-state rival.

"They are the big rival," Clark said, "but we haven't done a very good job competing with them this year."

"If we can do a good job of holding them down and making defensive plays, hopefully with the offensive side of it we can create a couple of innings and win a baseball game."

In the midst of their latest losing streak, the Wildcats have averaged fewer than two runs per contest, production unlikely to help K-State win many games.

The Wildcats' pitching and defense aren't keeping many opponents within striking distance, either. The Wildcats surrendered 33 runs against Baylor, and during its nine-game losing streak K-State has given up 89 runs.

The Wildcats have had just as little success against Wichita State.

The Shockers put up double-digit run totals in all three contests against the Cats, amassing 39 runs. Clark attributed that mark to Wichita State's ability to score in bunches.

The Shockers' run production against K-State has allowed few opportunities. WSU has scored at least three runs in an inning six times against K-State, and at least five runs in an inning twice.

Still, every time K-State takes the field they once again have the opportunity to get things headed in the right direction.

Clark said his players must forget about recent contests, including those against Wichita State, to keep the Shockers from extending their winning streak to four in a row against the K-State.

"Those games don't have anything to do with this game," he said. "This is a single game and we need to concentrate, play hard, and just do a better job of executing."

K-State coach Mike Clark argues a call during the Wildcats game against Texas A&M earlier this season. Clark announced his resignation on Monday after 17 years as coach of the Wildcats.

Wildcat coach to finish career

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When Coach Mike Clark resigned Monday afternoon, questions swirled about the future of Clark and of K-State baseball.

Their plans will coincide for the final two weeks of the season, though. Clark will remain at the helm for the Wildcats' final seven games.

"I wouldn't have done this if I couldn't have coached the last seven games," Clark said.

Clark will finish his 17th season as K-State's coach with four games against in-state rivals.

Wichita State starts the string tonight, with the Cats welcoming Oklahoma to Tointon Family Stadium for a three-game set May 9-11. The Cats then play KU in Manhattan on May 16 before traveling to Lawrence, where Clark will finish his K-State career with two games against Kansas on May 17-18.

Senior Tim Doty said the Wildcats have new motivation for the rest of the season.

"There's definitely going to be a purpose in everybody's step," Doty said. "We want to make sure we send Coach Clark off on a really good note because there hasn't been a player who has come here that hasn't loved Coach Clark."

K-State coach Mike Clark walks back to the dugout after inquiring about a strike call during the Wildcat's loss to Missouri on March 20 at Tointon Family Stadium in Manhattan. Clark, the longest tenured coach in K-State history, will resign at the conclusion of this season.

Clark is considered to be among the most respected coaches ever at K-State, Doty said. That makes his decision to resign even more difficult for K-State players.

"He's a great man," Doty said. "We just hope the last seven games as head baseball coach are the best seven games he's ever had."

That will be a tall order, as Clark has losing records against each of the Wildcats' final three opponents. He

College basketball | Eustachy resigns
Iowa State basketball coach Larry Eustachy resigned Monday, one week after the publication of embarrassing photos of him drinking and partying with students. Eustachy acknowledged that he was an alcoholic seeking treatment last Wednesday, the same day the school suspended him with pay and athletic director Bruce Van De Velde recommended he be fired.

The deal between Eustachy and Iowa State gives the coach $110,000 for the remainder of 2003 and a lump sum of $850,000 on Jan. 1, 2004.

NFL | Civil case begins against Faulk
St. Louis Rams running back Marshall Faulk had beaten the mother of three of his children on several occasions, the woman's lawyers told a jury Monday in opening statements of a civil case.

They said testimony this week would come from doctors and other witnesses, according to www.stltoday.com, the Web site for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

Faulk's lawyer said he had never hit the woman but had pushed her once.

The allegations and denials came in a case brought by Helen Dunne alleging domestic abuse by Faulk. The case is expected to last most of this week. Both Faulk and Dunne are expected to take the stand.

College football | Bama eyeing Shula
Miami Dolphins assistant coach Mike Shula has emerged as a top candidate to replace fired coach Mike Price at Alabama.

The former Crimson Tide quarterback met Sunday with Alabama athletic director Mal Moore and University President Robert Witt in Miami, according to newspaper reports.

"I will admit, I'm an alumni, I had great memories there. I love Alabama, just like everybody else that ever played there and that's really all I have to say," Shula told reporters in Miami on Monday.

Shula, 37, has never been a head coach. Moore said Monday head coaching experience wasn't mandatory for the hire as it was in his previous search five months ago when Dennis Franchione left Alabama for Texas A&M.

NHL | Wings turn down Robitaille's option

The Detroit Red Wings made an expected move Monday by parting ways with left wing Luc Robitaille.

Detroit decided not to exercise its option on Robitaille's contract for next season, saving the team $3 million — perhaps to spend on players such as Sergei Fedorov.

The 37-year-old Robitaille has 631 career goals, ranking first in NHL history among left wings. But he scored just 11 times this season, his 17th, as Detroit finished second in the Western Conference before losing in the first round of the playoffs to Anaheim. Robitaille managed an assist in four games against the Mighty Ducks.

The Red Wings will pay Robitaille $1 million for next season, instead of the $4 million they would have paid if they picked up his option.

College basketball | Changes proposed

The 3-point line in men's college basketball would be moved back 9 inches to 20 feet, 6 inches under a recommendation from an NCAA rules committee Monday.

The current distance of 19-9 has been in place since 1986.

The panel also suggested expanding the 12-foot-wide college lane by adopting the trapezoid used in international play. At its widest point, the trapezoid lane's width is 19-8 3/4.

The changes could take effect as early as next season, if approved by the NCAA championship committee next month.

College | Pitt AD leaving for Nebraska

Marc Boehm, whose whirlwind four-month tenure as interim athletic director at the University of Pittsburgh featured the firing of one basketball coach and the high-profile departure of another, is leaving himself to join his old boss at Nebraska.

Boehm said Monday he is leaving Pitt after six years to join former athletic director Steve Pederson at Nebraska in an associate's role. Both Boehm and Chancellor Mark Nordenberg confirmed that Boehm withdrew his name from consideration to become Pittsburgh's permanent athletic director.

College basketball | Bonnies' new coach
Anthony Solomon was introduced as St. Bonaventure's basketball coach Monday, ending a chaotic two months marked by league sanctions, a player boycott and the ouster of three top school officials.

Solomon, a 38-year-old former Notre Dame assistant, replaces Jan van Breda Kolff, who was fired last month. This is Solomon's first head coaching job in college, and he becomes the first black head coach of any sport at St. Bonaventure.

Cobb highlights K-State's trip to equestrian nationals

Sophomore member wins in Tennessee

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Always the bridesmaid, never the bride.

That label can be stripped from sophomore Elaine Cobb, whose win in intermediate horsemanship at the IHSA National Championships in Murfreesboro, Tenn., gave K-State its second national champion.

Cobb had finished second six times this season, including runner-up finishes at regionals and zones. Her lone victory came on Oct. 10 at Iowa State.

"I wasn't completely shocked that she was in the top five," Coach Lindsay Breidenthal said.

"She had been up there all season. For her to win, I'm just extremely proud of her."

The Western team, making its first showing at nationals, finished fifth behind Kristin Tanney's win in advanced horsemanship. Three Wildcats finished in the top five for the Western team, and all riders placed in the top 10.

"It ended up being a really good nationals," Breidenthal said. "I couldn't be much happier."

The English team also made its first appearance at nationals, tying for 15th.

"They all rode hard," Breidenthal said, "but it just wasn't their weekend. Sometimes that happens."

Senior Amanda Gigot capped her career with a fifth-place finish in the AQHA High Point Rider standings, competing against the top Western riders from each region.

However, Cobb's performance stole the show.

"Elaine's one of those kids who always has trouble in practice, but pulls it off in the shows," Breidenthal said. "I was a little skeptical at how well she'd do, but she just decided she was going to do it."

Last year, Brandi Vogel became K-State's first national champion by winning in advanced horsemanship. She finished fourth in open horsemanship and 10th in open reining.

"Brandi should have been higher," Breidenthal said. "The judging wasn't particularly in our favor."

Breidenthal expressed her uncertainty about a young, inexperienced crop of riders early in the season. That makes a strong showing at nationals particularly special.

"Nationals is my goal every year," Breidenthal said. "We came very close to winning. Hopefully next year we'll be even closer."

"Every year our team has improved. Last year we had just three individuals. This year we had four individuals, two high-point riders and both teams," she said.

As K-State continues to establish itself as one of the top equestrian teams in the nation, the future is as bright as ever.

"We took a virgin team to nationals," Breidenthal said. "In my eyes, we don't have anywhere to go but up. We'll be even better next season."

Name on Kedzie Hall ceiling another rite of passage

On May 17, I'll join a select group. With luck, I'll drag myself off the futon in time to shower before an early morning trip to Bramlage Coliseum to hear my name read.

I'll collect my faux diploma a month before the real one comes in the mail, and I'll shake a stranger's hand to commemorate my arrival into the real world.

Later that day, I'll schmooze with family and friends while reminiscing about wild times in Manhattan.

As the sun sets, my college career will be over. All the plans I've made and revised will finally have purpose. But my time at K-State will not have ended.

DAN SMITH

That comes later. At some point in the few days following graduation, before I begin my "real" job, I'll put a bow on the last five years.

I'll pack my stuff and drive around the Little Apple to look at the past with some perspective. Then I'll leave to carve out a place in the world.

Manhattan will be pictures and memories instead of home and comfort.

Before I go, though, I'll make one last trip to the newsroom alone to finish what I started nearly three years ago.

I'll uncup a Sharpie and risk my neck scaling a rickety desk to add my name to the hundreds that already adorn the Collegian's famed tiled ceiling.

For a few years, high school students on campus visits and bored Collegian staffers will see my name, read my quote and perhaps remember me.

When a new generation of college journalists inherits the Collegian, the ink will fade and other names will crowd my space. It will be more difficult to find my addition among the musings.

For now, though, there's still plenty of prime real estate. In the next two weeks, nine Collegian staffers will add their names. They might already have their spots picked out.

As for me, I've got a few choices.

I could sign in the reporter's room, where my Collegian career began.

That's where I caught the bug, writing about club and intramural sports.

The ceiling is almost bare in there, and I would have plenty of room, but it seems the air isn't as clean, and sometimes it looks like a cave.

There's not much space at all above the desk where I first became sports editor. In fact, the only spot left is pretty much guaranteed to JJ Duncan, the Collegian's arts and entertainment legend.

I could break with tradition and sign in the editor's office, where I spent last fall as managing editor, but the

SAVING FACE

Severity of blemishes vary, require diverse treatments, prevention tactics

By Wendy Gorman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Acne can rear its ugly head at any point in a person's life — not just during those pesky teenage years.

"We see it's pretty common among college students," said Brenda Williams, nurse manager for Advanced Dermatology. "I would say more than half our clients, probably 60 to 70 percent, are college-aged."

The cause behind acne remains the same at every age.

"It's mainly hormonal," Williams said. "It can be genetic. We see that it runs in families with cystic, scarring acne. The main thing is the changes in the body with puberty and adolescence, with the hormones and excess oil production."

Because acne can be mild or very severe, the condition is differentiated into four levels.

"Level one is generally more mild," Cindy Montoya, aesthetician at Salon Essentials, said. "If you get to level four and above, that means cystic acne, which is very painful and difficult to treat."

"Cystic acne is when you get a cyst that comes up on your face. It's like a pimple that never comes to the surface. It never comes to a head, so you can't extract it. They're usually reddish and purple in color and they're very painful. That's the hardest type of acne to get control of," Montoya said.

Dermatologists treat severe acne with a variety of products.

"We usually prescribe a topical benzoyl peroxide and a topical antibiotic," Williams said. "Sometimes, we prescribe Retin-A, which is a retinoid. If the topicals don't seem to help, we'll go on to prescribe an oral antibiotic. If the acne is really bad and scarring and nothing seems to help, we can use Acutane. We reserve Acutane for the worst cases. Sometimes if it's really mild, we just recommend cleansers."

It does not necessarily require a great deal of time or money to prevent acne. Dermatologists recommend simple measures to care for skin.

"We just recommend mild cleanser: Dove Unscented, Purpose and sometimes Cetaphil cleanser," Williams said. "We always say you can't scrub acne away. It's not a problem of dirt. It's excess oil."

Williams also said sun protection is important.

"With college kids, they're so big into tanning. It seems to help at first, but it can actually hurt in the long run," Williams said.

Williams said a sunscreen with an SPF of at least 15 should be worn, and people should avoid picking or squeezing the lesions because that habit can lead to scarring.

Montoya said regular facials are a good prevention tactic. She gives facials that include cleansing, toning and exfoliation, followed by steaming the skin and extracting blemishes.

"Steaming plumps the skin, forces debris out of the pores, and preps the skin for extraction," Montoya said.

Ariana Cox, junior in kinesiology, and Sarah Vasquez, junior in nutritional sciences, follow simple regimens with some of the steps Montoya uses.

"I use the three-step Clinique program," Vasquez said. "It's the soap, then an astringent and a moisturizer."

Cox said that she follows the same routine.

"And, once a month, I do the green mask," Cox said.

For severe, persistent acne, Montoya said, home maintenance and salon facials may not be enough.

"Facials will help keep the pores clean, but it won't help with the cystic acne, and they do need a doctor's treatment for that," Montoya said.

People should not feel guilty about indulging in facials, Montoya said.

"It's not only pampering. It's healthy for the skin."

Matt LeBlanc gets married

"Friends" star Matt LeBlanc has said "How you doin'?" to marriage.

The 35-year-old actor, whose dimwitted character on the popular NBC sitcom purrs that catch phrase to woo women, married fiancée Melissa McNight on the Hawaiian island of Kauai on Saturday.

The ceremony took place at night on a bluff overlooking Anini beach, LeBlanc's Los Angeles-based publicist, Joe Libonati, said Monday.

Texas native protests Dixie Chicks

A lone protester stood outside a sold-out Dixie Chicks concert during the band's first appearance in Florida since a member criticized President Bush over the war with Iraq.

The Saturday night show in Orlando was the first time the group had performed in Florida since lead singer Natalie Maines told a London audience on March 10: "Just so you know, we're ashamed the president of the United States is from Texas."

Texas native Thomas Newton stood at an intersection near the TD Waterhouse Centre wearing a cowboy outfit and holding a sign that read: "I Am Ashamed The Dixie Chicks Are From Texas."

Metallica honored with star-studded musical salute on 'mtvICON'

At first, Metallica's Lars Ulrich fretted that being an "mtvICON" meant he was finished.

"I just have this fear that when you talk about it in the past tense it means our better days are behind us," Ulrich, 39, said in a recent interview. "I'm still ignorant enough to believe we have some good days in front of us."

But Ulrich is becoming more comfortable with his stature as he reflects on the Grammy-winning band's 22-year history.

Tribeca Film Festival expands to establish an identity in its second year

Robert De Niro and his business partner, Jane Rosenthal, to organized the first Tribeca Film Festival after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

This year's event, which began Saturday and ends May 11, runs nearly twice as long as the first and is a hodgepodge of some 200 features, documentaries and shorts, with the weekends devoted to family films and activities.

BLOOD | Frequent donations help out those in need, provide simple way for students to become volunteers

"There was a huge amount of people donating."

Due to the excessive amount of donations, the American Red Cross experienced some backlash because of the wasted excess blood.

Now, Cox said, it is important for donors to realize that when they donate, the blood must undergo a 48-hour process before it can be used. She said donors must realize that only the blood that has been processed is the blood that saves lives.

"War is different," Cox said.

"We have advance notice of street fights, and we know that such events are coming."

And events like blood drives are some of the best ways for the American Red Cross to prepare for such events.

K-State sponsored a blood drive from April 7 to 11 that collected 910 units of blood from faculty and students on campus.

Dustin Kruse, sophomore in microbiology and pre-medicine and blood services chairman for the K-State American Red Cross club, said the goal for the blood drive was set at 700 units.

He said the increased donations may have been in part because of the patriotism Americans feel during times of war.

Despite donors' intentions, Kruse said, donating blood is simply an easy way to save someone's life.

"Every unit of blood collected is used to save three people's lives," he said.

Cox said even though the drive exceeded its goal, only 5 percent of eligible donors on K-State's campus donated blood.

Although that rate isn't bad, Cox said, that 5 percent simply coincides with how often Americans donate on a national level.

Despite percentages, Kruse said this past blood drive was the most successful spring blood drive at K-State in 10 years.

And blood drives are exactly what the Red Cross needs to help them out, Cox said.

She said with donor retention rates worsening in recent years, it is important for young people to donate whenever they can.

"The more often a person donates, the more it becomes a part of their life," she said.

And thinking about how donating blood influences lives is Quick facts about donating blood

- An adult of average weight has about 10 to 12 pints of blood
- Sixty percent of the U.S. population is eligible to donate blood, however, only 5 percent do
- More than 10 tests, nine of which are for infectious diseases, are performed on each unit of donated blood
- Red blood cells must be used within 42 days; platelets must be used within five days; plasma can be frozen and used for up to a year

- People who have been in car accidents and suffered massive blood loss may require transfusions of 50 pints or more of red blood cells
- Cancer, transplant, trauma and open-heart surgery patients require platelet transfusions to survive
- Blood centers often run short on type O and B blood
- Shortages of all types of blood occur during the summer and winter holidays what every eligible donor should consider, Cox said.

"Blood is something we all expect to be there," she said.

"When you are in the hospital, the last thing a person should have to worry about is an adequate supply of blood. Donating is a great way to use a volunteer hour."

CLARK | Coach resigns, anxious for new phase in life

wasn't about this season," Clark said. "It's about 17 years of seasons."

Ultimately, however, Clark said it was the last three months that confirmed what he had been feeling for more than three years.

Clark said he almost stepped down after the 1999 season, the same year K-State was forced to log 17,000 miles of travel while renovations to Frank Myers Field dragged on.

"The 1999 season was the toughest thing I've ever been through," Clark said.

Despite that adversity, Clark's club missed making K-State's first Big 12 Tournament appearance by only a half-game.

This season, though, the team's postseason aspirations were dashed early.

"When I looked in the mirror the last three months, I wasn't happy," Clark said.

Clark's immediate focus now turns to the Wildcats' final seven games. K-State's second-longest tenured current coach will end his Wildcat career on May 18 in Lawrence against in-state rival Kansas.

"I've got seven more opportunities," Clark said, "and I'm going to do everything I can to make sure these guys have success."

For Weiser, the national search for Clark's replacement begins immediately.

"Both Mike and I share a vision of one day hosting an NCAA Regional here and hoisting up a championship trophy," Weiser said.

"With his assistance, I'm confident we're going to be able to find the right person to move this forward."

Clark said he has no current plans after the season.

"I'm a free agent for the first time in my life," Clark said.

Clark's career

Coach Mike Clark resigned today after leading the Wildcats to their seventh losing season under his watch. Clark said his resignation is effective at the end of the 2003 season.

TORNADO | Storms level homes, result in deaths

near Nashville, Tenn.

"It's worse than a nightmare," said Stacy Silverwood, whose grandparents were killed by a twister that blew part of their Camden County, Mo., house down a hill and into a pond a half-mile away.

The storms were part of a huge weather system that also spawned twisters Sunday and early Monday in Arkansas, Mississippi, Kentucky, South Dakota and Nebraska. The National Weather Service posted new tornado warnings in Kentucky and Tennessee as the storm system moved eastward.

One of the hardest hit areas was Madison County, Tenn., where 10 people were killed. Rescue crews with cadaver dogs were searching a small lake for a father and son who were missing.

In Jackson, the county seat, streets were blocked by fallen trees, twisted sheets of metal, power lines and bricks. Officials said at least 70 homes east of downtown Jackson were destroyed and streets were littered with snapped trees and utility poles.

Among the survivors in Jackson was retiree T.E. White, 69, who huddled in a closet with his three young grandchildren while a tornado ripped off the front porch and part of his roof.

"I didn't have time to be scared," White said. "When I came out and saw what happened, then I got scared."

In Pierce City, where Sunday's storms killed two people and struck nearly every home and business in the town of 1,400, Mayor Mark Peters said tornado warning sirens sounded in advance.

A hand-scrawled list on the door of City Hall listed eight townspeople as "possibly missing." Several other names had been marked through, replaced by reassuring entries about those people's whereabouts.

Officials initially feared the missing were dead in the rubble of the National Guard Armory, where several townspeople took shelter as the storm approached. One body was found in the building during the night.

But after searchers accompanied by dogs dug through the debris, regional emergency official Glenn Dittmar said he was nearly certain no one else would be found. Many residents checked on their neighbors and hugged when they found each other.

Richard and Darlene Young had been talking about having a tree removed from their front yard in Pierce City when the storm struck. "Me and the wife and the little dog got in the bedroom closet," Richard Young said.

When the Youngs emerged, they found that tree was unharmful, but it had been joined in their yard by the bell tower from the neighboring First Congregational Church.

In Jackson, a tornado warning was issued 22 minutes before the twister hit. That gave lawyer Joe Byrd and law clerk Jen Free plenty of time to get from his office to a concrete storage area in the basement.

"It's like downtown Baghdad," Byrd said of the destruction he found when they emerged from the shelter. Free, 24, said she ran to a nearby hotel to help get the elderly out of their apartments.

"I was knocking on doors, yelling to everyone they needed to get out," Free said. "They were walking down the stairs holding hands and being amazingly calm."

In Kansas, 80 homes were damaged or destroyed in Crawford County, at least 20 of them in the Franklin area.

"It wiped out a third of the town, I hate to say it," said Edlon Bedene, the county emergency management director. "The trees are like somebody came in and cut them off 10 feet above the ground."

President Bush, visiting Little Rock, Ark., said the government would move as quickly as possible to help the storm-damaged areas.

has won just six of 39 games against Wichita State and is 17-44 against Oklahoma. His lone winning record is a 38-27 mark against Kansas.

The Wildcats have struggled this season, setting the program record for consecutive losses. But that was then, Doty said. Today is a new day.

"The first part of the season is out the window," he said. "We have seven left. That's it. We're just going to go after it hard and try to get Coach Clark some wins."

The injury bug hit K-State in 2003 as well, compounding the problems. Season-ending injuries to junior Ty Soto and senior Gabe Luttrell put a dent in the Wildcat lineup.

"Ty Soto is one of the best young guys," Clark said of the 2002 All-Big 12 third baseman. "So is Gabe. Not having them in the lineup really hurts."

The Wildcats were forced to patch together lineups all season. Clark said he was most proud of the effort his team has displayed despite the adversity it has faced.

"I'm proud of the effort they have given under very difficult circumstances," Clark said.

"A lot of kids would have quit. They would have said, 'We're not doing it, so let's go a different way.'"

Instead, the Wildcats have rallied around their coach. Nearly a dozen players, past and present, were on hand for Clark's resignation.

"Every group is special," Clark said.

"I don't have a favorite, but I do have individuals like Tim Doty that are so good, not only on the field, but off the field."

But the game is decided on the field, where Clark has just seven games remaining, just seven games donning purple.

And seven more outcomes to be decided.

"I want them to have success," Clark said. "I'm going to do everything I can to make sure they're successful in some way. Hopefully we can win seven ball games."

"Those guys we play better be ready, because I know my guys will be."

I switched desks when I returned to sports this spring, but that didn't provide any extra space on the ceiling. Instead of sports guys here, the names of former photo, copy and opinion editors decorate the tiles above my desk.

So maybe I'll sign next to the plastic "Right On" arrow I collected last semester. It hangs from the ceiling now as the only evidence left from an executive pub crawl in the fall.

I'll spend some time adding my name, making sure to take it all in as I say goodbye for the final time to the place that made me something.

Now I just have to come up with a nugget of knowledge. Words always seem to come a little harder when you're saying goodbye.

But maybe it's as easy as that. For now, at least, it'll have to be.

Goodbye.

Campus relies on warnings

Preparation key for tornado safety

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tornadoes killed more than 50 people in Kansas and Missouri on Sunday, but officials say being properly prepared can minimize injuries and fatalities during severe weather.

Ronnie Grice, director of K-State Police, said students simply need to remember what they were taught throughout their lives — get to a basement if possible, or move to an interior room with strong walls.

Campus buildings do not have specific tornado plans,

Grice said, but the Jardine Terrace Apartment complex does have some shelters.

"It's definitely a project we're looking at for the future," he said, although tornado plans for buildings are in the works.

Mary Knapp, state climatologist, said it is a common misconception that tornadoes can not hit Manhattan.

In fact, she said, 16 tornadoes have hit Riley County since 1950, and three have hit since 1990. The 1966 tornado that devastated parts of Topeka came through Jardine.

"The reality of it is, tornadoes are not deterred by topography," Knapp said. "Manhattan doesn't have any magical protection that keeps tornadoes away."

Although there hasn't been any severe damage from tornadoes in the Manhattan area, Knapp said that could depend entirely upon the city's level of development when a tornado hits. For example, the 1966 tornado would have caused much more damage if it struck the same places today because the north and west ends of Manhattan are more developed.

Fifty injuries were reported in Manhattan during the 1966 tornado, and Knapp said the community is lucky not to have any deaths due to tornadoes.

"What you shouldn't do is underestimate the damage that can occur," she said. "If people are alert to the conditions, they can minimize risk, and chances of survival increase dramatically."

MHS principal resigns, accepts position at K-State in College of Education

By Jessica Packard
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan High School Principal Teresa Miller turned in her resignation Monday to pursue a career at K-State.

"We were not expecting it," Michele Jones, USD 383 communication coordinator, said.

Jones said Miller turned in her resignation letter on Monday and e-mailed staff members the news.

Miller said she decided to resign after she was offered a job with the Educational Administration and Leadership Department at K-State. Miller said she will assist aspiring principals in receiving their certificates.

"It seemed like an opportunity that would not come up again, and I thought I should take it," Miller said.

David Thompson, department chair for Educational Administration and Leadership, said Miller will not only teach the course "Principalship," but will also be involved with providing assistance to practicing

LIVING WITH LOSS

Families, friends suffer through grieving process

Editor's note: Each year, K-State loses students to death. As students and faculty move on with their daily routines, those who have lost loved ones continue to struggle to balance their feelings of pain, anger, sadness and hope. The Collegian explored the grieving processes of the families and friends of four K-State students who have died.

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

She has those dreams — the haunting ones that jolt her awake in a cold sweat.

Lindsay Courtney, sophomore in family studies and community service, dreams about her best friend, Ali Kemp, who was beaten, sexually assaulted and murdered in the pump room of a Leawood, Kan., swimming pool.

She has questions. Who did it? How? Was Ali in pain? Was she scared? Why did she have to die? All are left unanswered.

"It haunts you in your dreams. We don't know what happened until we find the person," she said. "I want to know details and why he did it."

Lindsay has been through the stages of grief. She knows what it means to be in denial, to be consumed with anger and to be so overwhelmed with depression that it takes effort to get out of bed.

At first, people are avoiding the pain of losing their loved one, said Dan Wilcox, a psychologist at University Counseling Services.

"People are in a time of avoidance. The loss can shake them up. That feeling of overwhelmed is never far, and when you feel overwhelmed, your head and mind go into denial — you don't want to face it in some respects," he said.

There can be a lot of emotions. With grief, your emotions can vary widely. You can be sad, and you can have a memory and be touching the next moment.

and angry the next."

A person will then experience a time when they can face the pain, Wilcox said.

"The reality of the loss is real, and it's hard not to be reminded of the loss again and again and again. It's hard to avoid, so it is an emotional time."

After sifting through all the pain and memories, the person must learn to face life alone.

"The next task is adjusting to the new world without forgetting the old," he said. "At this point, you are stopping the intense emotions. It is normal to start feeling better, but a memory or a smell or a place you are driving by will cause some of that pain to well to the surface again."

The death of a child makes the grieving process even more complicated.

"It is supposed to happen, where the children watch the parents go," Wilcox said.

The anger involved when someone is responsible for a loved one's death adds yet another dimension to the grieving process.

"Not only are you grieving, but you are angry at the person who took their life," Wilcox said. "It is a complex time emotionally. You can focus your attention on the trial. Later on after that is all over, you start to grieve."

Grieving is a lifelong process, but the pain fades, and a sense of normalcy eventually returns.

"The goal is not to get over it, that you want to forget and stop having experiences. The goal is to be able to reinvest yourself in your own life and future and look ahead and hold on to the relationships and the memory that you have with your loved one."

It isn't getting over it. It's holding on and letting go.

Ali Kemp, Oct. 11, 1982
June 18, 2002.

Phil Howes, Ali Kemp's boyfriend of five years, closes his eyes and imagines the day she was killed. He wants the details so the dreams will end.

"I want to know different things so what I think will go away," he said.

The events of that day are still a vivid memory for Phil, a University of Kansas sophomore in business and accounting. He had planned on going out to dinner with Ali that night.

"I was waiting for her to call, and I called her cell phone, and she didn't answer," he said. "Then, her brother picked up. He said, 'You haven't heard?' Her mom told me, and I met them at the hospital. We knew what happened, but we had hope she was alive."

Ali was pronounced dead at the hospital.

"I was in shock," Phil said. "It was hard not to have her there to help me deal with it."

When Phil called Ali's friend Lindsay Courtney with the bad news, she refused to believe it.

"I was sleeping, and he called me. I thought he was joking, and I asked to talk to her," he said.

There was no time but time as the search for Ali's killer began immediately. Phil and Lindsay plastered the Kansas City area with fliers, knocked on doors, and were interviewed by police officers countless times.

"Right away, I had to start doing stuff. There was so much stuff," Howes said. "I had something I was doing all the time."

Ali's friends and family walked down to donate clothing donations for the search and for the Ali Kemp Foundation, which has raised $120,000 for scholarships and self-defense classes. Phil coordinated a virtual manhunt, e-mailing the composite sketch and crime scene details to the Greek community at K-State and KU.

BANTER AND BELLOW

Bonding with self, friends, nature should be focus of upcoming summer vacations

LAYTON:

I need nothing more than three months devoted to appreciating everything, and the nothing surrounding it all. The perfect summer meets the requirement of completely escaping every extraneous distraction. Summer gives us the chance to recharge and gain control and focus in our lives, which some of us badly need.

So, under the stars that stretch from horizon to horizon is where I'll find my peace.

I've got to smell the freshy-fresh scent of a lakeside campfire and listen to the sincere laughs of people who enjoy my company for the sake of just that, and the reciprocity that follows. I need the busy street in front of my house to disappear and I need time with my guitar to make sense of the senselessness that goes on between my ears.

For once I'd like to fall asleep to the simplicity of silence, without the noise of the ever-prevalent drunken neighbors, the noise of traffic — especially the crotch-rocketeers, the retire- ment-age rebels of the upper-middle class on Harley-Davidsons (I'm sure you are to be feared) and the sirens screaming directly in front of my house at 4 a.m. every other morning. Cheers, and thanks a hell-of-a-lot.

The essence of the escape I need is summed up in lyrics by Shannon Hoon to a song called "I Wonder."

"Hey I'd like to daze away to a place no one has known / In a state of mind I could call mine and only I could own / Where I can hum a tune any time I choose and there's no such thing as time / Where I can feel no pain just calm and sane what a place for one to find."

Goodbye to you all.

DANA:

This summer, I'm planning on working a lot. Honestly.

OK, so I shouldn't complain. If I were a self-made millionaire, or even the supreme goddess/princess/voodoo priestess of some jungle isle, I would still really have to work. Too many languid days in a hammock would cause the summer heat to bore into my painfully deep soul.

Or else I'd just be totally bored and stuff. Like, whatever, man.

But I could envision a few months without work — if there were plenty to do.

One solution would be travel. If we could wave magic wands and eliminate all this international tension gibberish, and if I had stacks of cash, my feet would be high-steppin' it straight into some fun-bound jets.

The destinations? Anywhere that offers intellectual stimulation, as well as some tasty eye candy. Italy comes to mind. There, I could observe David, the guy who needs to shop for some clothes. I could also stare at David, the dark temporary man-friend who would cook me pasta and share the wonders of Italy with me.

But it doesn't take vino and red sauce to spice up a summer. I'm sure we could all find some hearty fun at home.

Perhaps some of the greatest July months of my life have included barefoot walks in the grass, backyard barbecues and catching up with old friends.

Somehow, summer just seems to have a wholesome glow around it. I'm pretty sure it's not the UV rays, but I'll check with my knee freckles on that one.

It must still be the mojo flow of the sun. Sure, it's wearing, but it's also such a relief from the gray overcast that we call our working, schoolbound, shivering lives of January.

A little hammock time, then, can definitely do a Dana good.

Good luck this summer, kids, and remember to wear your seat belts.

Families favored in rezoning

By Rogie Dörpinghaus
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

More than 15 homeowners spoke in favor of passing the first item on the City Commission agenda Tuesday night.

City commissioners passed phase one of the Traditional Neighborhood Overlay district unanimously.

Phase one will down-zone an area west of City Park and north of Poyntz Avenue.

This down-zoning proposal has been in the works for two years and is based on input from citizens, businesses and neighborhood groups, including the Planning Board and the City Commission, research by the College of Architecture, Planning and Design, and research from the Community Development Department.

There are four phases to the rezoning plans, three of which recommend down-zoning and one up-zoning.

The Planning Board proposed down-zoning to provide maximum protection of neighborhood character and ensure no further increase in development intensity.

Mark Hatesohl, city commissioner, said he was going to pass the item, but didn't want to see the same people back at the meeting in which the commission will decide whether to up-zone in phase four.

"To me, student slums equal not enough housing," Hatesohl said. "And students need a place to live."

Manhattan resident Jan Borst said she didn't think student housing should among the city's concerns.

"I don't see why the city feels they need to provide housing for students," Borst said.

Hatesohl said that K-State recruits more students and has shown no interest in housing all of them on campus, but the students must live somewhere.

Marge Davidson said she has lived in the same house in Manhattan her entire life, and pleaded with the commissioners to save her neighborhood by passing the down-zoning phase one.

"In my life, there have been tremendous changes in the neighborhood," she said.

Manhattan neighborhoods need stabilization, resident Brad Hartman, said.

"It's not that we don't like students," he said. "I live next door to a sorority, and we just want to stabilize what we have because stability encourages investment."

Gary Coates, architecture professor, worked with architecture students to form this plan.

"It's an exciting time to be a commissioner to be put in the position to influence the quality of life for years to come," he said.

Target store seeks employees; scheduled to open doors in late July

By Crystal Wellborn

Manhattan residents will have more shopping opportunities in Manhattan when Target opens its doors in late July.

Target, the second-largest discount store in the country will open its doors July 27, Brie Heath, spokesperson for Target Corporation, said.

Heath said the new store will be hiring between 100 and 200 new employees and will be a good fit for the Manhattan area.

"It's a perfect market for us with the university, and the market has been underserved," she said.

Heath said that although Target is looking to hire college students, community members could also help fill the vacant spots.

"I would assume we will have some students apply that are staying for summer school, but there are plenty of other residents that would be interested," she said.

Heath said that anyone interested in employment with Target can go to one of the two job fair opportunities to get an application.

The first job fair will be from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. May 8 and 9 at the temporary trailers outside the store location. This fair is for those seeking management positions.

Heath said there are requirements for management, but she encourages people to come to the fair.

"We usually want college graduates with some retail experience, but anyone is more than welcome to come and learn more about it if they are interested," she said.

There will be another job fair from May 29 through May 31. Heath said the times and locations of this fair are unknown as of this time, but information will be updated on the store's local information line, 539-1274.

Lyle Butler, president of the Manhattan Area Chamber of Commerce, said opening a store like Target in Manhattan is beneficial for students.

"This is another store for students to purchase the things they need. They can stay right here in their own community to shop instead of going to Topeka," he said.

"This also gives students employment opportunities."

TO THE POINT

K-State-Salina students deserve praise for work

Although the economy, especially in the aviation area, has suffered a downturn in the past 18 months, students at K-State-Salina consistently find jobs after graduation.

The campus must be doing something right.

During fall 2002, students achieved 100 flight ratings. Also, the professional pilot program has granted more than 50 associate and bachelor's degrees to students annually in recent years.

Those students should be commended.

With the economy in its' current straits, and with many students left still searching for a job when graduation time comes around, it's encouraging to see K-State students who are finding jobs and proving that the university is a success.

Much of students' success has to do with their working hard to find jobs, said Marlon Johnston, head of the aviation department at the Salina campus. Their hard work can be inspirational to other students who are still looking for full-time jobs after graduation.

K-State-Salina's top-five ranking further proves that the campus is doing all that it can to ensure its students the tools necessary to pursue life after K-State.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

Let me just say this: The guy who took the girl home was very, very lucky.

Hey, ladies. It's hot outside, so you should wear less clothing.

Watching "Harry Potter" makes me want to hump young boys.

I live with two people from Nemaha County, and I have to go to bed with duct tape over my butt hole every night.

Thank god. Mike Clark finally resigned from the baseball team. Maybe next year we'll have a good baseball team.

How come none of the chicks that I ever get to sleep with will never let me poop on their chest?

The only thing worse than no tequila on Cinco de Mayo is a herd of wild donkeys.

Cinco de Mayo is the only time Americans wish they were Mexican.

So, should I act like I don't care, or should I pursue him redressly?

God loves you, but Jesus has his doubts.

Sell crazy somewhere else. We're all stocked up here.

Wow, the hottest Lambda Chi is definitely a freshman from Lawrence. He is truly amazing.

GRADSPEAK

Confusion remains popular plan for new graduates

So, what are you going to do after graduation?

If your response to that question is anything like mine, it probably involves an intense desire to shatter the questioner's limbs.

What am I going to say? "Actually, I have a double major in English and history, so my chances of ever getting a job in today's market are about the same as finding a girl who would consciously agree to go out with me?"

The truth sometimes hurts — especially when graduates are talking about their future plans. So they fudge a little bit. Who's to know, right? Unfortunately, this makes it hard to figure out what they're really doing. In fact, it makes it counterproductive to ask them what they're planning.

For this reason, I have whipped up a handy and/or dandy guide to translating statements from Gradspeak into English. It might help you figure out what graduates' real plans are. Or not.

Gradspeak: I am considering a position with a large food services corporation. It has a lot of room for advancement.

English: The McDonald's in Junction City is hiring. They told me that if I could stick it out for longer than six months, I might have a shot at shift manager.

Gradspeak: I am going to graduate school in the fall.

English: I could not get a job in the real world if it knocked me down on the street, mugged me and left me its phone number.

Gradspeak: I plan to travel in Europe for a while.

English: I am from Johnson County, and after I get back, I will live at home and work at one of the numerous shopping complexes in my neighborhood.

Gradspeak: I have several irons in the fire here in town.

English: I am whipped beyond belief by my significant other, so I will stay in Manhattan and get any minimum-wage job I can in order to be near him/her.

Gradspeak: I plan to work on my novel while I teach at a high school.

English: I will come home every night after class and barely finish grading assignments and polishing lesson plans, after which I will collapse in the La-Z-Boy and watch the latest inane TV show, happy to have some respite from my pitiful, artistically frustrated life. I will also eat entirely too much fast food and become a chain smoker after realizing that most kids just don't care about the wonders of literature.

Gradspeak: I have gotten a job as a systems administrator for an information technology firm.

English: I am going to live in my parents' basement and play "Counter-Strike" on their antiquated computer in between helping my brother-in-law work on his independent operating system that he says will blow Microsoft out of the water. I will often cry at night as a result of getting taunted and "lag-fragged" by those AWP camping f46s with their DSL Internet.

Gradspeak: I have some friends in the garment industry who say they can get me a managerial job overseas.

English: I am going to oversee one of the Indonesian sweatshops that produces clothing for the Kathy Lee Gifford Collection.

Gradspeak: I have a number of exciting opportunities lined up. At the moment, it is a simple matter of deciding which one to pursue. I certainly do not want to commit myself prematurely.

English: I have no opportunities lined up. If I did, however, the indignity I would suffer upon accepting any of them would be more than sufficient to nullify any positive feelings I had about them.

Gradspeak: I am not entirely sure, but I sure will miss this place.

English: I am not entirely sure, but I sure will miss this place.

Well, some things are the same in both languages. Have a nice life, y'all.

Columnist keys readers into discarded column topics from semester

Three years and seven days ago, a great storm was building in the heavens. The thunder clapped with the ferocity of Zeus' anger and jagged lightning danced from the skies. Suddenly, a lightning bolt struck the earth and ripped the ground in two.

From the newborn crevice arose a tablet of stone. Inscribed on this tablet were column ideas for the rest of my career.

Yeah, right. Coming up with ideas for columns is tough. Here are a few I deliberated on but decided wouldn't be such a great idea.

1. Paul Restivo is a big fat jerk

When I was brainstorming this masterpiece, I knew this topic would be too easy. First, I would have written about what an offensive bigot Restivo is. Then, I would delve into his obsession with writing about body parts and including crude humor in his columns. Using my wit to throw stones at Restivo's lack of taste would have compromised a majority of the content. Then, for good measure, I was going to throw in a few digs about his personal appearance — maybe make fun of his wardrobe or something.

However, when I sat down at the computer the day before deadline, I wondered if Restivo might fire me for writing a column about what a big creep he is. I guess him being the opinion editor does technically make him my boss.

As these troubling thoughts began to surface I opened the newspaper and read the Fourum.

Ahh, problem solved. There was no need for me to write a column about what a big jerk Restivo is. Day after day the Fourum was filled with comments to warn students that Paul Restivo is a menace to his profession and fellow students. What a relief!

2. How to spice up your war protest

Before we began "Operation Iraqi Freedom," the corner of Anderson Avenue and 17th Street was often crowded with people protesting the imminent war. Holding true to your political views and expressing your opinion is a fundamental American right.

However, if you are going to protest a war, why not spice it up a little? Come on, people, this is 2003. A piece of poster board with your bad penmanship that says "No war in Iraq" just doesn't cut it anymore. What happened to cool slogans like "Make love, not war"? Face it — the 1960s protesters had cooler music and better slogans.

I would have been more than happy to have stopped by your protest if you had handed out some neat ink pens and lemonade and maybe added a four-color brochure to the package. Oh well, there is always next time.

I chose to shelve this column idea because the war started and I thought, "Who would want to protest a war that has already started?" Well, I was wrong about that, but I had already moved on to another topic.

3. Why can't I make it to Spanish class on time?

I decided against this topic for obvious reasons — who cares? But I did wonder if anyone else had that one class in their college career that no matter what they did, they were always late. It is as if there was a universal force that wanted me to be late to class.

That 8:30 a.m. class is too early for me — but even when I did wake up on time, everything that could possibly detain me did. I got behind a school bus, an ambulance came barreling down the road, I couldn't find my keys, homework or other necessary items for class. I knew there was a higher universal power working against me when I was late for my Spanish video that started at 6 p.m. I don't think I could have made it to Spanish class on time if God told me to.

If you have any great column ideas, e-mail me. Sometimes I am so desperate for topics I will ask Paul Restivo if he has any suggestions. Obviously, I need help.

Professor to teach, research in Malaysia as Fulbright scholar

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Mustaque Hossain will leave the country in July to spend the fall semester on the other side of the world.

Hossain, professor of civil engineering, was recently named a Fulbright Scholar and will spend five months teaching and conducting research at the University of Malaya in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia.

"I am pleased that my achievements have been recognized," he said. "This is a very prestigious award, and it's not common for engineers to receive it — it's usually geared toward other disciplines."

Hossain said he is the first K-State professor to receive the scholarship in 12 years. He said he received the award after working on a proposal.

"You have to apply for it," he said. "You have to write a proposal of about five pages explaining your teaching and research plans."

Hossain said he would like to offer a post-graduate class in highway infrastructure asset management. He also said he hopes to convert the class into an electronic medium.

"One of the reasons I picked Malaysia as the country to work in was because I am originally from southeast Asia. Malaysia has built up a good infrastructure, and now preservation is important."

"Another reason is that I have noticed they are not sending many students overseas into K-State," he said. "I would like to see if we can recruit some."

Hossain said he has one possible explanation for why few Malaysian students are attending college in the United States.

"I think they trained a lot of students over here, and when they got back in Malaysia, they developed their own programs over there," he said. "They're becoming self-sufficient. The university I'm going to is very impressive."

Hossain said he is leaving for Malaysia in July.

"Different Fulbright scholars have different schedules and are going to different universities," he said. "Some will be in their host country for 10 months, and some will be gone for five months. I'll be gone five months."

The length of stay depends mainly on each university's leave policy.

"I have a research program here and a number of different projects," he said. "It really wouldn't be possible for me to be gone for a long period of time."

Hossain said he will be doing a combination of teaching and researching, while in Malaysia.

"I'll be traveling to some different universities and giving lectures to them," he said.

Hossain said his wife will be joining him on the trip.

"She's going with me," he said. "We have to go to a foreign country and start a new way of living, but it's only for a short period of time."

Hossain said he is looking forward to the experience.

"I'm excited about the interactions I will have teaching in a foreign environment," he said. "It's quite a challenge to teach students of different ethnicities."

Hossain said he also hopes to be a successful researcher.

"I want to be remembered as a good teacher and researcher," he said. "And I encourage other faculty to apply for this scholarship to spread the message of what Kansas and K-State are like."

Aviation students have job success

K-State-Salina students find full-time work with ease

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

No industry took a harder hit after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, than the airline industry.

This hit continues to affect not only aviation, but the entire economy as well.

Despite the country's economic struggles in the past 18 months, aviation students at K-State-Salina are still having success after graduation.

Marlon Johnston, head of the aviation department at K-State-Salina, said there are several reasons for the students' success.

"First of all, the students have made good contributions to the companies they have gone to," he said.

"We have a reputation for good graduates. Students who do get out and talk to companies make a good impression, and they have the training and credentials to do so."

The most important reason is the extraordinary effort put forth by the students, Johnston said.

"Students are getting out there and looking for jobs," he said.

"There are problems with the economy, and aviation has suffered, but the students find that if they put themselves out there and work hard, there are some jobs available."

The condition of the economy is definitely having an effect on students finding jobs, said Robbie Sanders, junior in airway science and student body president at K-State-Salina.

"We have had some luck getting students out, but we are holding out for the economy to turn around," he said.

"We are overly optimistic about the future. Once the economy straightens out, things are going to get better — I can't imagine it getting any worse."

Airlines have had to cut budgets and reallocate funds because of competition, Sanders said.

"Even though they are two different types of companies, huge airlines are being forced to match their prices to those of smaller airlines in order to compete," he said.

"They have to cut their cost per mile to prevent passenger falloff."

Flying is essential to people, though, Sanders said.

"We are a high-paced society," he said. "Travel needs are there, and I don't think anybody would be willing to go back to traveling solely by train or bus."

The Salina campus offers two courses of study, and what students study may determine where they end up, Johnston said.

"Aviation maintenance students usually stay in the Midwest," he said. "Their breadth of skills and academic training makes them valuable to companies, even in hard times. Pilots look at the regional airlines. They might stay here in Kansas, but they can also go to Texas or South Carolina."

The school is definitely one of the top in the nation, Johnston said.

"We are on an upward trend," he said. "The program is growing — our enrollment is increasing. The more people we have in the field, the more our quality is recognized. Individual representatives have told me that our program is among the top five in the nation."

K-State second baseman Marc Chabot extends after a base hit during the Wildcats' loss to Wichita State Tuesday at Tointon Family Stadium. The game probably marked the last meeting between Shocker coach Gene Stephenson and K-State coach Mike Clark, who will resign at the conclusion of the season.

K-State's eventful week continues with WSU loss

By Dan Smith
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

The final stanza of Mike Clark's tenure at K-State wouldn't start in storybook fashion Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium, but what did happen was pretty special nonetheless.

In Clark's first game back on the diamond since announcing his resignation Monday, K-State seemed to do everything right but score in dropping the team's 10th straight contest — a 2-0 setback to Wichita State.

"We played well, and darn it, they did too," Clark said. "It was an awfully well-played college game."

Missed opportunities on offense ruined Kevin Melcher's longest career start, and Wichita State managed just enough contact at the plate to sweep the season series 4-0.

After Melcher retired six of the first seven Shockers he faced, K-State threatened to score first in the second inning.

WSU starter Jereme Foster got into trouble early in the inning by surrendering a leadoff bloop single to Tim Doty. Doty advanced to second on a fielder's choice during the next at bat and would move to third on a wild pitch later in the inning.

But after Zach Saunders walked to put runners on the corners, Foster induced a double-play ball from Terry Blunt's bat to escape with no harm done.

The Shockers' Nick McCoola reached on the first of two Wildcat errors on the night with one out in the third, and Phil Napolitan plated him two batters later with a single to left field.

Pat Maloney would become the second Wildcat to reach third base in the fourth inning after a leadoff walk, but K-State's offense went in order after that to squander another early scoring chance.

"We just couldn't get a key base hit, and they got a couple of them," Clark said. "That's really the difference in the ballgame."

K-State stranded seven compared to the Shockers' four, including two each in the fifth and eighth innings.

"Everything was there today," first baseman Tim Doty said, "but we didn't get the hits when we needed them."

After WSU added an insurance run in the seventh with Bryan Erstad's second home run of the season, K-State put runners in position again in the eighth.

Doty's two-out single to right brought Ryan Baldwin to the plate, and after another single to center put two on, Saunders made the best

Pitchers recover after WSU

It was a bittersweet game for K-State's pitching staff Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium.

While suffering a 2-0 loss to Wichita State as a team, the pitching staff received a solid eight-inning effort from senior Kevin Melcher, tying his longest career outing.

The two runs also ended the Cats' recent pitching skid, in which they allowed 10 or more runs in their last five outings, including a 12-3 loss to the Shockers on April 30.

"It's definitely a turn in the right direction," Melcher said. "We've had a rough season. The pitching staff has been hit around, and tonight was the night to turn it around and get off on a good foot going into Oklahoma."

Coach Mike Clark agreed, giving credit to Melcher for his performance.

"I just had a feeling that Kevin, after a frustrating year, would go out and give us a great chance to win the ball game, and that's what he did," Clark said. "He's a great

Nightmares may be warnings

Offended athlete teaches columnist journalistic lesson

Nightmares appear in many forms.

In my dreams, I've been attacked by sharks and stalked by sports columnist assassins. Lord knows how many school halls I've walked down in search of my mysteriously absent pants.

But on Saturday night, my nightmare was much more real, much more scary and much more 6-foot-8 and 235 pounds.

I came home to find Matt Siebrandt sitting in my chair.

It all started a couple months ago with another string of events best described as a nightmare. I was working on deadline, trying to hack out a prelude to the K-State versus Oklahoma State men's basketball game.

The season was winding down, and the Cats' early season hope was fading fast. I wanted to build my story around an interview with Siebrandt. He had become the most consistent player, and as a senior would likely have a unique opinion of K-State's slide.

I chose to talk to Coach Jim Wooldridge first. He supplied me with some excellent material concerning Siebrandt's senior leadership and increased level of play.

Then, it all started to go wrong.

Midway through the interview, the tape in my recorder broke. I scribbled furiously to keep up with Wooldridge. Fortunately, the interview was short and I was able to halfway manage.

All that was left was to talk to Siebrandt, drive back to the Collegian International Headquarters and type my article.

The K-State Sports Information Director went into the locker room to find the forward but returned with bad news.

Siebrandt wasn't talking.

I made do for the article anyway. Instead of a feature on senior leadership, I talked to a deserving up-and-comer, Tim Ellis. Nonetheless, Siebrandt's reluctance to talk puzzled me.

It took me a month to find out why. Apparently people don't like it when you write columns about their "ugly" shot and ungraceful maneuvers.

Oops.

So there I was, two months later with the man who swore he would never talk to me again staring me in the face.

It wasn't even that he was sitting in my chair, he was sitting in my throne — the place where I rested while pumping out endless sports articles. The place where I

Intramural season finishes

By Wes Marfield

In a matter of days, students will begin cramming for finals. That means it's also time for the spring intramural season to wrap up.

This spring featured increased participation, including a spike in the number of softball teams. Last spring, there were 308 teams compared to the 326 that entered this year.

The number of teams entered, assistant director of intramurals John Wondra said, was the best part of the spring season.

"The highlight would probably be the number of softball teams we had sign up," Wondra said. "That would be the biggest moment of the spring sports."

The increased participation did not bring more unsportsmanlike conduct, he said.

"Overall, things went smoothly," Wondra said. "With the increase in teams, we really didn't have any increase in ejections or protests."

In basketball, Wondra said, ejections happen more frequently than in softball.

"Overall, softball tends to run smoother," Wondra said.

On the negative side, though, Wondra said there were more forfeits in softball, primarily because teams need more players to compete in a game than in basketball or other team sports.

Inclement weather also can be a problem, but only two days of competition were canceled due to weather.

"During the regular season, we had two days that were rained out," Wondra said. "Other than that, we got through the regular season pretty smoothly."

Problems aside, the intramural program is a way to get students involved and give them a chance to get exercise. Wondra said the spring season gave students these opportunities despite any problems that may have surfaced.

"The main goal is to give the students and the campus population a chance to participate in organized activity and fill their recreational needs," Wondra said, "and I think we met that goal."

NBA | Saying goodbye to Jordan OK

Washington Wizards owner Abe Pollin wants to do what he believes is right for his team this time, even if that means saying goodbye to Michael Jordan.

At his state-of-the-union speech to Wizards employees last week, Pollin gave a hint of his mindset heading into a crucial meeting with Jordan on Wednesday.

Pollin said that while he has always been a "league guy," he is now going to do "what's best for the franchise," according to two team sources familiar with the speech and speaking on condition of anonymity.

Pollin's clear implication was that he would not be swayed by anyone when he makes his decision about whether to continue his relationship with Jordan, who had planned to return to the Wizards' front office after his two seasons back on the court.

College basketball | Iowa State moving on

The conference championships Iowa State won under Larry Eustachy brought the school some of its brightest moments.

During the last week Eustachy was the key figure as it went through one of its darkest periods, battering the image of this normally tranquil campus and leaving a basketball program in disarray and a community divided.

"I don't ever remember an issue as divisive as this," said Dr. Jon Fleming, an Ames physician and longtime Iowa State booster. "It's been an ugly, messy time."

NHL | Wings turn down Robitaille's option

The Detroit Red Wings made an expected move Monday by parting ways with left wing Luc Robitaille.

Detroit decided not to exercise its option on Robitaille's contract for next season, saving the team $3 million — perhaps to spend on players such as Sergei Fedorov.

The 37-year-old Robitaille has 631 career goals, ranking first in NHL history among left wings. But he scored just 11 times this season, his 17th, as Detroit finished second in the Western Conference before losing in the first round of the playoffs to Anaheim. Robitaille managed an assist in four games against the Mighty Ducks.

The Red Wings will pay Robitaille $1 million for next season, instead of the $4 million they would have paid if they picked up his option.

MLB | Nen's surgery will end season

San Francisco closer Robb Nen will have season-ending shoulder surgery Wednesday to repair a partial tear to his right rotator cuff.

The Giants said they sought medical opinions from the top sports medicine orthopedists in the country. The arthroscopic operation will take place in Wilmington, Del., and will be performed by Dr. Craig Morgan, the same doctor who performed similar surgery on Curt Schilling in 1999.

Nen's throwing shoulder has not responded to two operations during the past five months, including one on April 18, and an extensive rehabilitation program. He's expected to be ready for spring training in 2004.

NASCAR | Earnhardt Inc. fires driver

Steve Park was fired Tuesday by Dale Earnhardt Inc., ending the tenure of the first full-time Winston Cup driver hired by the late Earnhardt.

"Steve was instrumental in DEI's first NASCAR Winston Cup program," said Earnhardt's widow, Teresa. "Our loyalty to each other was hard to overcome. However, the time came where we simply had to make a change."

The team hired Jeff Green on an interim basis. He was fired Monday by Richard Childress Racing. Green drove a Busch Series car for Earnhardt in 1995, the first year Earnhardt stopped driving it himself.

NBA | Duncan highlights All-NBA team

Two-time MVP Tim Duncan made the All-NBA team Tuesday, just the sixth player in league history to receive that honor in each of his first six seasons.

Also on the All-NBA first team were Los Angeles Lakers teammates Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal, the Orlando Magic's Tracy McGrady and the Minnesota Timberwolves' Kevin Garnett.

young man and I was proud of him."

Sophomore Eric Rollins came in to pitch the ninth, allowing no runs while striking out two, but after the game, the buzz was Melcher's performance.

"It was a great game," Rollins said. "Melch came out and did his job and threw good for us out there. He just got a bunch of ground balls, and that's what you want."

It's been a tough season for K-State's pitching staff, as evidenced by the team's 7.56 ERA entering Tuesday's contest. Even worse, they haven't been able to find out what has been plaguing them all year.

"This whole season, most of us have been baffled on what was going wrong, because we know we have a good, talented staff," Melcher said. "We have had a tough time - I still don't believe anything is wrong with the staff."

Melcher had been experiencing the problems on a personal level. Now 0-6, Melcher said he had been having problems with his mechanics during the initial part of the season.

"Earlier this season, I was dealing with a bad arm angle," Melcher said. "I picked up a bad habit over the summer, and we noticed it over spring break. We've been spending time from then on working on getting me back to where I pitch normally."

The problem, he said, was with his release angle.

"I was coming in too quick, so I was pushing the ball, and that was taking off velocity," Melcher said.

Whatever he has been doing has worked. The senior was nearly untouchable against Wichita State.

"Tonight was definitely a good night," Melcher said after the game. "I felt the most comfortable with everything on the mound - confidence and mechanics."

contact of any Wildcat batter all night off WSU reliever Noah Booth.

The ball popped off Saunders bat to deep center, but Nick Blasi got a good jump and camped under the liner to keep the lead intact.

Clark got three consecutive outs from reliever Eric Rollins in the ninth to keep the Shockers within striking distance, but the bottom of the Cats' order would go quietly to extend WSU's streak over K-State to seven in a row.

The combined two runs were the fewest scored ever in the series, a span of 67 games and 97 years.

"The pitching was excellent and they just got a couple of key hits, and we had baserunners on all ballgame and couldn't get them home," Clark said.

Foster worked six innings and struck out three to move to 3-0 on the year. Melcher dropped to 0-6 after going eight for K-State. WSU's Mike Dennison earned his 11th save with a perfect ninth inning.

Despite the loss, Melcher said it felt good to start the season's stretch run with a quality effort.

"What happened yesterday hit us all really hard, but Coach Clark has explained himself," he said. "Today, I felt - and I'm sure the team did - that we needed to get off to a good start and send Coach Clark off in the right manner."

wrote my columns and the whole mess started.

And, amazingly enough, he didn't throw me out the window.

Instead, amidst a throng of onlookers, we talked, made up, took a picture together and he even gave me his cell number.

If I hadn't been worried about dying, it would have been a great time.

We talked about basketball, K-State, his future in Europe and my future as a writer.

The "ugly hook shot" - it's water under the bridge as far as I'm concerned. I'm no longer afraid of Siebrandt. When I see him at a bar, I won't run the other way. I hope that when he sees me, he won't want to pulverize boulders.

As for hanging out again, I'm down. He was cool and can party all night.

But I still need be wary. While I doubt the crazy Cat I partied with Saturday night would still break me in half, you never can be too careful.

There is one thing I do know, though.

I probably won't call him ugly or ungrateful again anytime soon.

Now he knows where I live.

But the investigation has reached no conclusion.

"They are basically still nowhere," Phil said.

After the case was featured on the TV show "America's Most Wanted," thousands of calls poured in, and police are continuing to follow up on the leads.

Phil said he is confident they will find her killer — bringing the chance for closure.

"That's the number one thing," he said. "We're not going to stop helping until this guy is caught."

Returning to college and a normal life is when the pain began to hit Lindsay, who is seeing a counselor.

"Since we had stuff to do, we didn't have to think about it. When we were doing all that stuff, it seemed like she was there. I am now starting to realize she isn't here."

"It's hard to come back here to see places where we used to go. There are still places I don't go."

Phil said he still has trouble going out with friends, but helping others go through their grieving processes has provided some healing.

"A lot of guys had questions, and I talked about it. They are afraid to talk about it now. They will accidentally say her name and then say, 'Oh, sorry,' he said."

"There are certain days that we are upset and I don't even know why. I will go out and then I will think of her and want to come home."

Phil has relied on his faith in God to heal his broken heart. "I have questioned my faith," Phil said. "My strong faith has helped me get through it. Everything about how my parents raised me is helping me."

The case's high-profile status added to Phil's stresses after the murder.

"I wasn't used to it. The only reason I did it was because it would help the case. I became a spokesperson for all the girls. Their parents didn't want them to be on TV in case the guy was watching. I was going from place to place meeting reporters."

And they both know the grieving isn't over. The one-year anniversary of Ali's death is soon — a day Phil knows will be difficult.

"It will probably be the hardest," he said. "Birthday and Christmas are good days. That day will be the hardest."

Lindsay said there are no plans for the anniversary.

"I don't want to do anything. I just want to lay in my bed and not talk to anyone," she said.

Once they reach that year mark, Phil and Lindsay know the grief will still follow them the rest of their lives.

"I think I will be grieving all my life. There will always be a hole with something missing," Phil said. "I think of myself as a freshman and sophomore. Last year was wild and going to parties. I feel more mature now."

Lindsay's college experience will be different from her peers' memories.

"It made us mature. The first thing my dad said to me was, 'You're grown up now,' she said. "It changed everything. Our college experience will be different. It will be difficult to explain to your future friends or kids, 'This is what happened to me in college.'"

Diego Velasquez, Nov. 19, 1981 — Jan. 1, 2002.

Every morning,

Fernando Ugarte walks to the cemetery to talk to his son. On Sunday afternoon, he and his wife, Inez, place red roses on the grave.

They still don't know what happened that night their son, Diego Velasquez, was killed. The man they believe killed him already has served his community service sentence.

"Our whole life was turned upside down, but we cannot do

Above: Sarah, Tim and Barbara Shipley have relied on their Christian faith to help them cope with losing their brother and only son, Chris Shipley, former K-State freshman, has been missing since Dec. 4, 2001 after going sailing at Tuttle Creek Lake. His body has not been found.

anything about it," Inez said. "Whatever we say will not bring Diego back. We feel very sorry for what happened."

The Ugartes were vacationing in San Diego while Diego and his fraternity brothers attended the bowl game in Phoenix, Ariz.

One of Inez's most precious memories comes from the day before Diego left for his trip.

"I remember the day before he went to his trip to Arizona. He was dancing with me in the kitchen and he said, 'Shall we dance?' We were like two little kids, dancing around and laughing a lot."

Then, on Christmas Day, Fernando took Diego to Manhattan from their home in Marysville, Kan., to meet his fraternity brothers. The last advice Fernando gave his son was don't drink, don't drive at night and always wear your seat belt.

But Diego didn't follow it. Instead of driving to his home in Marysville, when he arrived back from his trip, Diego stopped at a friend's house in the Kansas City area to celebrate the New Year.

When he called his parents to tell them where he was, they were upset but unable to do anything.

"We are in San Diego. What can we tell him on the phone?" Fernando said. "Whether we like it or not, he was celebrating. I said, 'Just let him celebrate.'"

At 1 a.m., Diego and Matt Dunn left the party — drunk. No one is sure what happened next, but around 3 a.m., Dunn's truck crashed. Diego was not wearing a seat belt and was thrown onto the interstate and killed instantly.

Dunn served 60 days in jail and was sentenced to community service hours.

"We do not feel justice was served," Fernando said. "Not in this case or in any cases of drunk driving. The law is too lenient."

It was friends and faith that gave the Ugartes strength to move on.

"The people in Marysville were excellent," Inez said. "They really helped us out a lot. They knew we didn't have family here."

Both kept busy with their careers in the year following the death.

"I think the first year was very difficult," Inez said. "We were very emotional. For both of us, jobs helped, but when we were at home, it was very empty."

Working at K-State as a Spanish instructor has provided a coping mechanism for Inez.

"Everybody thought I would take a semester off, but I said, 'No, it doesn't make any sense,' she said. "It was a very difficult time, but I went. Being with the students helped me a lot — they helped me in my grief. I was distracted with a lot of work, and without knowing it, they helped me in my grief."

Clearing out Diego's room was a difficult step in Inez's grieving process. The room is now completely empty.

"For me, it took a while to go into his room," she said. "I had to go because I wanted to give away his clothes."

Inez gave Diego's furniture to her godson, who was moving into an apartment, and his bicycle went to a special friend of the family.

However, Inez can still feel her son near to her.

"Some days when I am here, I feel like he is around here. He would play peekaboo with me," she said. "Sometimes when I was cooking and Diego would tiptoe around me and all of a sudden, 'peekaboo!'"

The sadness has brought Fernando and Inez together as they began to see life from a different perspective.

"We started to see life from another point of view. It made us closer," Inez said. "It is still very difficult. We feel very empty. Even though he wasn't coming here every weekend, we feel very empty."

They do have their regrets, but they realize there is no reason to dwell on them.

"Why would we allow him to go on this trip?" Inez said. "It's impossible to say no. He saved money, and we couldn't say, 'Don't go.' We felt he needed to do his own stuff. He was 20 years old. We felt he was fine to start to discover the world by himself. I can't have regrets about that."

Kyle Chapman, Jan. 31, 1983 — missing since Dec. 4, 2001

Eighteen months ago, Nancy Chapman was standing at the side of Tuttle Creek Lake while boats and helicopters searched for her son, Kyle. She waited, watching the waves hit the rocky shore, hoping for any signs that her son was alive.

Kyle, along with his friends Chris Shipley and Tim Bennett, all former K-State freshmen, had gone sailing but did not return. All three boys were experienced sailors and Eagle Scouts.

"When I looked at the timeline — if they are not on land, their bodies are cold," Nancy said. "We were thinking they were sitting on the shore."

"These kids were resourceful. If they made it out of the water, they were saying, 'Our moms are going to kill us.'"

But as the day went on, the possibility of never finding Kyle seemed more of a reality. The boys' shoes were found lined up on the dock. Shipley's truck was parked along the shore.

"I had to go around and walk out on the dock. I had to have a picture in my mind," she said. "I had to be able to say, 'You did see every angle.'"

Nancy, along with her daughter, Mary, and son, Jacob, stood at the water's edge when Bennett's body and the sailboat were found.

"We knew something was going on because you could see the sunlight reflecting on the emergency vehicles. I told Jacob to see what was going on," she said. "He got there just as they were pulling Tim out of the water. He realized it wasn't just standing around looking for his brother. Somebody had died."

Still, the boats and helicopters searched for the other two boys.

"We would sit there and say we could picture them coming over the hill," she said.

When Nancy, divorced in 1994, went back to the hotel that night, she went alone. Her ex-husband did not come to the lake for the search.

"The only anger I had out at the lake is that everyone had family there," she said. "Everyone had someone to lay down with at night and talk. I didn't have anybody to share my inner thoughts with."

Nancy then decided to give herself 30 days for the rangers to find her son's body. After that, she would move on with her life.

"Kyle would have wanted to be cremated," she said. "I said I would give them 30 days to find him."

But Kyle's body has not been found.

"I am OK with him being in the lake because that's where they wanted to be," she said.

Nancy grieved alone during the next year. She said she had to muster her strength to keep her family together.

"You kept telling yourself you had to keep going because there were other kids in the family, but they understand. It keeps you some normalcy and doing the same things."

Not only did she fix dinner and help her children with homework, she attended the same Boy Scout meetings that she had attended with Kyle — this time with her younger son.

"I have had an easier time because I still have another son. He kept me active in the same activities. Having two kids made you get out of bed and move forward," Nancy said.

That Christmas, only three days after Kyle's memorial, the Christmas tree was up, but barren. The presents were bought but not wrapped.

Returning to work was a big step for Nancy.

At work, she sent out a mass e-mail to avoid the constant questioning from her co-workers.

"I got really tired of people asking how you were doing," she said. "I sent an e-mail out to my office saying it's OK to say, 'Glad you are back.' It was tough to have everyone giving you a hug. They didn't know what to say — well, there's nothing to say."

Now, a year and a half later, Nancy still gets teary-eyed when she talks about her son. It is easy for her to pretend he is just away at college.

"They'd gone to college, so you didn't talk to them every day," she said. "I can sometimes feel like I just haven't talked to him this week."

She said she still dreams about the life Kyle would have had. He was coming out of his shell at K-State.

"It's like a book and the chapters get better, and then someone rips off half the book, and you don't get to see the end."

Chris Shipley June 23, 1983 — missing since Dec. 4, 2001

There's that slight chance he is still alive.

Barbara and Tim Shipley cope with that possibility daily. The "what ifs" haunt them, but deep down, they know the truth. Their son, Chris, died 18 months ago at Tuttle Creek along with Tim Bennett and Kyle Chapman. His body is still underwater.

He didn't run away. He wasn't kidnapped. He's gone.

"I have police reports. The only thing we don't have is a death certificate. Until they find him, there's that one-tenth of a percent it didn't happen," Tim said.

It was hard for Barbara to accept, but she found a way to give up hope that her only son was alive.

"Once I was confident that's really what happened, that no one kidnapped him, it became a spiritual issue. He was with God, and that's all that mattered," she said.

But that peace didn't come easily.

"We couldn't sleep," Barbara said. "When I closed my eyes, I could imagine watching the rescue team pull Chris out of the water and heave him up over the side of the boat."

Barbara went to work and faced her co-workers' endless questions. She opened letter after letter from parents who had lost a child.

"I felt like I was ill," she said. "My insides felt like they were ripped, torn and bleeding. If I kept to my normal daily activities, it would help smooth over the ill feeling."

"Most days, I psyched myself up to make it through the workday, and we just held each other."

That summer, the Shipleys went to the Boy Scout camp where the three boys had met.

"We realized we were envious of the other parents," Barbara said. "You realize you have nothing to brag about. There are no new experiences to brag about."

Tim and Barbara pressed on toward the year mark, a landmark in their grief process.

It was like a hurdle, they said, but they found only more hurdles to overcome.

Tim remembers the day he was watching the evening news and a report came on about the start of classes at K-State. As he watched, he began to cry.

"It sneaks up on you," Tim said. "The things you know are coming up are easier. It's the things that sneak up on you that get you."

They watched feel-good movies to lull themselves to sleep. They walked in circles at the mall to keep their minds occupied.

"Panic attacks were never far from the surface for me," Barbara said. "The thought of never seeing Chris again was horrifying. Never hearing him say, 'How's it going?' Never seeing his smile or the twinkle in his eyes when he was teasing. Never knowing how tall he would get. Never getting to see him be a father."

Another hurdle in their grief process was letting go of the fear that they would also lose their daughter, Sarah. Barbara also feared losing Tim.

"I nearly panicked to the point of lunacy the first time I watched Tim back out of the driveway to return to work," Barbara said. "I wasn't sure that he would be coming back to me. After all, I had let Christopher go to camp and school, and look what happened. There were no guarantees that Tim wouldn't follow the same fate. My heart wanted to grab Tim and keep him at home, but my head let him walk out the door."

"That summer, Sarah went to color guard camp. The minute the bus left the school parking lot, I headed to my van and cried and prayed God to please let her come back to me unharmed. As life continues, those feelings have subsided."

Slowly, they found peace. Church became a place of comfort.

"On Communion Sunday, I thought, 'Now I know what God gave up — his only son.'"

From that point on, Tim and Barbara knew it was time to let go — Chris was in a better place.

"Someone told me it would never get better," Barbara said. "As a Christian believer, of course it will get better. He's better. Now I just have to heal."

There are still days full of tears, days when it is hard to get out of bed and when life seems overwhelming. But the human heart can handle a lot more than the Shipleys ever imagined.

"You aren't numb because it hurts," Barbara said. "Somehow, your mind finds a way to block out the pain. You don't have any other choice."

VOLUNTEERING TO SAVE LIVES

Volunteers David Graham (right) and Scott Sundell drain the fire hose at the Blue Township Fire Department. "I volunteer because I like helping people, and, of course, driving fire trucks," Sundell said.

K-Staters work as part-time firefighters

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

They're just like other busy students — until their beepers go off when they're sitting in class or studying for a final.

Six students spend time each week volunteering at the Blue Township Fire Department, just outside Manhattan along Highway 24. Tim Keegan, Bryce Mongeau, Scott Sundell, Nate Karstens, David Graham and Chris Flynn put in more than 50 hours of training each. They help with fund-raising events, attend weekly meetings and respond to about 175 emergencies each year.

For Tim Keegan, graduate student in animal science, the choice to become a firefighter was natural. Keegan has been a volunteer since he turned 18 and joined the department last June after moving to Manhattan.

"My dad had a lot of health problems when I was younger," he said. "I watched volunteer firefighters come out and help him all the time. That just inspired me a lot. It's something I'll be doing the rest of my life."

Firefighters also influenced Bryce Mongeau, junior in biology and pre-medicine, during his childhood.

"My grandfather, dad, uncles, brother — everybody in my family has been a firefighter. It has always been a part of my life," he said. "I heard about the Blue Township and heard it was a good department, so I joined."

Mongeau has been a volunteer firefighter for five years and is also an emergency medical technician for Riley County Emergency Medical Services. He said volunteers respond to calls ranging from grass fires to medical emergencies.

"We do the exact same things as other full-time departments," he said. "We face the same risks and train the same way."

Fire chief Eric Ward said the 30-member, all-volunteer fire department covers areas outside the city along Highway 24 and the Tuttle Creek reservoir area. He said the department's activities fluctuate. However, firefighters often respond to up to three to four fires per day during grass fire season, mid-March to mid-May.

"We could go three weeks without having anything happen, but then again, a couple weeks ago we had two house fires within two days of each other," he said.

Ward said the department has undergone much transition since opening about 30 years ago.

"In the past, the majority of folks who volunteered lived in the community. Like most departments, that demographic shifted. Now, most of our membership don't have any real ties in the community, or what we do get is a lot of energy and eagerness that we might not necessarily get otherwise. These guys are specifically here because they want to be firefighters."

But maintaining that enthusiasm and involvement in the department is sometimes difficult when school responsibilities begin to add up.

"You may be planning on doing homework for the next two hours, but if you're paged out, you have to find another time to do that," Mongeau said.

"It's hard to balance school and maintain a relatively active status at the fire department, but it's very fulfilling," he said. "There's a strong sense of brotherhood between all the firefighters, male and female alike. We're like one big family and just kind of take care of each other."

Nate Karstens, junior in computer engineering, said volunteering at the department is good leadership experience.

"We're a pretty young department, but when a new person comes in, everyone chips in and teaches them how to do stuff," he said. "It's a good teaching opportunity."

David Graham, junior in industrial engineering, has volunteered at the department for more than a year. He said he became a firefighter after hearing about the job from other people in his residence hall.

"It's a really good group of people," he said. "It's just a good feeling to know that you're helping out and doing it just because you want to help — it's better than getting paid."

Karstens agreed.

"It takes a lot of time, but it's worth it," he said. "If you ever get into it, it's something you don't give up."

SUMMER SCHOOL AT DODGE CITY COMMUNITY COLLEGE

THE SMART MOVE.

Fit some additional college credit hours into your summer plans the convenient way. Summer 2003 classes at Dodge City Community College start right after Memorial Day. Four, five and eight-week sessions give you plenty of flexibility to plan your schedule.

NEED AN INCENTIVE?

Here are a few:

- Five (count 'em-five!) different summer school sessions mean you have more options. Take an additional class or enroll in the session that suits your schedule.
- Class sizes at DCCC are small. That means you get individual guidance from your instructor.
- 98% of our students believe their two-year college experience prepared them well for transferring to a four-year school.
- 99% of community college graduates maintained a GPA of 3.0 or higher at their four-year school.

LEARN ON THE ROAD.

WORK OF ART

Graduate student displays art at local gallery

By Tony Herrman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For the first time ever, the Strecker-Nelson Gallery has made space available to sponsor a student because they have been impressed with the ceramics program at K-State.

The gallery chose Donna Cole, whose masters of fine art thesis sculptures are displayed in the gallery at 406 Poyntz Ave. along with the work of Judy Love, Janet Massad, Brenda Diederich and Brian Hinkle.

Cole's work was selected for display because she was named the outstanding graduate student by the faculty of the art department. The exhibit will be shown through June 14.

Cole said she uses a ceramic process called crystalline firing, where the glaze is molten and crystals form in the firing process. As the form then cools, those crystals freeze.

Jay Nelson, director of the gallery, said the appeal of Cole's art comes from its individuality.

"I think it's extraordinary in that it's a totally unique process," he said. "The crystalline glazes and the way she's doing them is not standard procedure. It's something she invented."

"I think that she has applied that in a particularly appropriate way because of the natural form that she's replicating."

Nelson said his favorite piece of Cole's was "Eternity," a white porcelain piece.

"It has a certain purity and makes a very strong statement. It's not so much a thing of Geo as a thing of art," he said.

Cole said the environment of her home in Portland, Ore., has greatly influenced her work.

"They capture the look of weathered stone and little pools of glass," she said.

"These represent the shoreline. Oftentimes there's animal tracks running through, and the pools of glass symbolize tide pools."

"My work is also an exploration of interiors in contrast with exteriors. So the pieces will have a rough skin on the outside and appear to be open and reveal several layers of something different. I think that is metaphoric to the curiosity of what's inside of things — a fruit, a box or a shell."

Before entering graduate school, Cole taught at Portland Community College. Her husband and three children stayed in Oregon during her final year at K-State.

Donna Cole, graduate student in fine art, has her thesis sculptures on display in the Strecker-Nelson Art Gallery at 406 Poyntz Ave. Cole's art is on display along with other Kansas artists' work.

Cole's husband, Warren, surprised her by coming to the reception at the exhibit on May 2. Donna said she was not expecting Warren until this week to help move her back to Portland.

"But I couldn't miss the opening," Warren said.

Even though it meant time away from her family, Donna had a strong motivation for choosing K-State.

"The most important is for the ceramics professors here," she said. "Yoshi Ikeda and Anna Calluori-Holcombe are both well-known ceramic artists, and it's a tremendous opportunity to work with them."

"Also, in my situation, where I was teaching, I couldn't leave for three years to do a residency, so Yoshi and Anna put together a special program for me where I've flown back and forth, but I've done my work in Oregon."

This last year Donna was on campus fulltime.

"It's been a unique situation. But it's a situation that addresses the needs of professionals who need an advanced degree, but have the constraints of family and career — the things that come along with life as it advances," she said.

Elton John, Bernie Taupin bringing 'Vampire' to Broadway

Longtime musical collaborators Elton John and Bernie Taupin are planning to bring "The Vampire Lestat" to Broadway, and they promise a production free of gothic excess.

"It will be dark, sexy and scary, but that doesn't mean it has to be cliché," Taupin said Tuesday at a news conference to announce the show.

The project, based on the character from Anne Rice's novels, is the first production from Warner Bros. Theatre Ventures and is scheduled to hit the stage in 2005.

Surgeon sues 50 Cent for unpaid medical bills, expenses

A surgeon who treated 50 Cent for bullet wounds three years ago has sued the rapper for more than $32,000 in unpaid medical bills.

Dr. Nader Paksima said in papers filed in Manhattan's State Supreme Court that he operated on 50 Cent, whose real name is Curtis Jackson, at a hospital in May 2000 for several gunshot wounds.

PERSONALITY PROFILE

Patricia Yeager

OWNER OF PATRICIA'S UNDERCOVER

1. What would you like to be having for dinner tonight?

"I tend to like nutritiously dense food, vegetables and whole grains. I could almost be a vegetarian. Almost."

2. Who is your favorite musician?

"Joni Mitchell. She is an excellent poet, and I love the way the melody goes with the words exactly the way she would speak it. Also, my new version of that is Patty Griffin."

3. What kind of car do you drive?

"A Subaru Impreza. It carries a lot of cargo."

4. What was the last movie you saw?

"I haven't been to a movie for a while either 'Beautiful Mind' or 'Harry Potter.' They're children's movies, but I love them."

5. What is your must-see TV show?

"NYPD Blue or Sopranos. The Sopranos has a lot of interpersonal development of the characters, and there's a lot of moral to the stories among all the problems. Sometimes, I do have to turn it off because it gets too violent for me. I like 'Six Feet Under' for the same reason."

6. What is your favorite place to eat out?

"There's so many good ones. CoCo Bolos because of the friendly bartenders and waitresses. It's good food, though it's rich, so I can't eat it every day."

7. Who is your idol?

"I think I've outgrown having idols. There are particular traits I like about certain people, but I don't idolize anyone. I think it's important to do self-actualizing, to create your own identity and feel good about it."

8. What is your favorite alcoholic drink?

"Mike's Hard Lemonade, no question."

9. What is the craziest thing you did in college?

"I'm not very interesting. I wasn't very crazy. I guess nothing I'd care to admit."

10. Have you ever cheated on a test?

"No."

MILLER | Search to begin for new MHS principal administrators who wish to improve their skills while maintaining a close contact with public schools in Kansas.

He said the department had conducted a year-long national search to find someone to qualify for the job, and he and the department are happy with their decision.

"Dr. Miller is absolutely the best qualified person to fill this position," Thompson said. "The department has the highest respect for her and we believe her ideas will improve our program enormously."

Miller said she has worked with the department before and is looking forward to the teaching aspect that will be available in her new position.

"I love teaching, and that's what this is about," Miller said. "I have always said I would like to end my career in the classroom, and this is a way to do that."

Thompson said Miller will be teaching this summer and will begin her full-time position in August.

Jones said the search for a new principal will start after the Board of Education accepts Miller's resignation at its meeting tonight.

"Once the board looks at her resignation and accepts it, we will then start a statewide search and then a regional search," Jones said.

Jones said that although there will not be a lot of time to replace Miller before the new school year, the search will be thorough.

"We'll have to put the search on a fast track but be very diligent in our search," Jones said.

"It's a large high school, and it will take a significant amount of time for someone to prepare."

Miller said she has enjoyed working with the people and the relationships that have developed during her career with the district.

"One of the highlights here is I've been able to see several kindergartners all the way through high school," Miller said.

"Now, I can hopefully see them through college."

Bush names head of counterterrorism office to oversee transition in Iraq

By Tom Rau
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush named L. Paul Bremer, a former ambassador and head of the State Department's counterterrorism office, to be his special envoy to Iraq and oversee its transition to democratic rule. The appointment resolved a debate between the State Department and the Pentagon over the administration of Iraq, with Secretary of State Colin Powell pushing for greater civilian control and Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld seeking a strong hand for the military.

Bremer will become the civilian administrator, leading the transition team that includes retired Army Lt. Gen. Jay Garner, currently the top-ranking U.S. civilian in Iraq. Bremer will oversee all political and reconstruction efforts.

Bush announced the appointment Tuesday during a White House meeting with Rumsfeld. He said he was "sending one of our best citizens" and called Bremer "a man with enormous experience — a can-do type of person."

The president said he has "full confidence" in Bremer, who was present when Bush made the announcement in the Oval Office.

Bremer, 61, was a former assistant to former Secretaries of State William P. Rogers and Henry Kissinger. He was ambassador-at-large for counterterrorism from 1986 to 1989. He served as U.S. ambassador to the Netherlands.

He later worked for a consulting firm headed by Kissinger and currently serves as chairman and chief executive of the Marsh Crisis Consulting company.

In his new assignment, he will be senior to Garner, a retired Army general, representing a military-to-civilian handoff. A White House statement on the appointment said that Bremer, as the "senior coalition official in Iraq," would report directly to Rumsfeld. Gen. Tommy Franks, commander of all U.S.-led forces in the region, "will maintain command over coalition military personnel in the theater," the statement said.

Bremer will oversee the transition from rule by Saddam Hussein to an interim Iraqi government.

The Bush administration has said it expects this government to include a wide diversity of Iraqi groups.

Bush said Bremer "shares the same values as most Americans share, and that is our deep desire — to have an orderly country in Iraq that is free and at peace, where the average citizen has a chance to achieve his or her dreams."

Pentagon officials said Tuesday that experts are examining an Iraqi trailer suspected of being used as a mobile laboratory for chemical weapons.

Saddam urges Iraqis to fight on 1st allegedly made tape since leader's fall is heard

By Salah Nasrawi
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

CAIRO, Egypt — In a new audiotape — the first allegedly made by Saddam Hussein since U.S.-led forces ousted his regime — the deposed Iraqi leader urges his countrymen to fight foreign occupation.

The Sydney Morning Herald said it received the 14-minute tape from two men in Baghdad on Monday who said they were trying to get it to Al-Jazeera or Al-Arabiya, two Arab satellite television channels.

There was no way to confirm if the tired-sounding voice on the tape was that of Saddam, although the accent and phrasing were akin to that of the ousted leader.

"Through this secret means I am talking to you from inside great Iraq, and I say to you, the main task for you, Arab and Kurd, Shiite and Sunni, Muslim and Christian and the whole Iraqi people of all religions, your main task is to kick the enemy out from our country," the speaker said.

By way of establishing that the recording was made recently, the voice on the tape noted some Iraqis had celebrated Saddam's 66th birthday April 28 even though he was not in power. The speaker referred to Saddam in the third person, a practice common in Arabic.

"It was an Iraqi decision (to celebrate), because they consider Saddam Hussein as a brother or as a father to them. And this is just to express of

Rice warns Syrians of action

U.S. may act if Syria hid Iraqi weapons of war

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

MADRID, Spain — The United States would be forced to act if it discovered Syria let in Iraqi weapons of mass destruction during the war, National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice said in an interview published Wednesday.

Rice said she was sure Iraqi weapons of mass destruction — the main reason cited by the United States for invading Iraq and ousting Saddam Hussein — would turn up eventually.

But she said it was possible some had been removed from Iraq before the fighting concluded last month.

"We have assurances from the Syrians that nothing crossed their borders. Time will tell," Rice said in the interviews given Tuesday in Washington to El Pais and three other Spanish dailies.

But if that assurance turned out to be false, it would create a very serious situation and the international community would be forced to act, Rice said, according to El Pais.

Pressed as to whether this meant another war, Rice

Vidyaranya Nanduri needs a bone marrow donor, someone who could save his life.

But Vidya isn't in the habit of asking for help — so his friends are asking for him.

After being diagnosed with leukemia in January, Vidya, graduate student in mathematics, has undergone extensive chemotherapy sessions at Via Christi Regional Medical Center in Wichita, Kan. He is scheduled to meet with his doctor Friday to learn the final results of a bone marrow biopsy that could decide his fate — whether he should continue chemotherapy sessions or undergo a bone marrow transplant immediately.

Without a bone marrow donor, however, he has few options.

"If biopsy results are good, then I have the option to choose between chemotherapy or transplantation. Both these things have their own risks and advantages, but if I choose to do a bone marrow transplant, then I need a donor," he said. "If the biopsy results come back and I have blasts, then I will need a transplantation and therefore a donor."

However, the 26-year-old from Hyderabad, India, remains positive as he awaits biopsy results.

"Things are just positive and working well for me," he said. "So far, I have no blasts and hope there won't be any. Either way, I'm not scared at all to get the results."

His friends, however, aren't taking any chances.

Murthy Karri, Laxminarayan Mukhtinalapati, Lakshmikanth Ganti, Satish Motipalli and Shekhar Gosavi have set up a bone marrow drive from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m., Friday in the Union Little Theatre.

Radio station provides real-life work experience

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

One of the oldest college radio stations in the country resides in Kansas.

In fact, it resides here at K-State, inside the K-State Student Union. It's KSDB-FM 91.9.

The station is entirely student staffed, except for the faculty adviser, Candi Walton.

"The students pick the programs, what it's going to sound like and who's going to be on the air," Walton said.

Some students put in as many as 40 to 50 hours a week, said Josh Wells, senior in radio and television and the program director.

"We employ roughly 85 students," he said. "The only requirement is that you're full-time."

CAMPUS JOBS

The Collegian takes a closer look at students who earn their college cash on campus.

The amount of work is evident — this year the station won 21 awards from the Kansas Association of Broadcasters, Wells said.

"These students work very hard to make sure we turn out a quality product," he said. "But they have a lot of fun doing it."

The pay is only minimum wage to those who receive pay, but that's not important to them, Wells said.

Matthew Althouse, sophomore in radio and television, speaks over the radio waves during a station break Wednesday morning during his shift at the KSDB Wildcat 91.9.

"It's a drop in the bucket compared to the time we put in," he said. "We have student managers on-call 24 hours a day. It's a sacrifice, but it's something we love, and it's a great experience."

SPOTLIGHT | President Wefald

Wefald outlines movie script concerning black athletes, has hopes for production

By Lindsey Tipling
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When K-State President Jon Wefald went to visit the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum in Kansas City, Mo., five or six years ago, he did not know that the experience would inspire him like it has.

Wefald said he was impressed by the setup at the museum.

"It was one of the most moving museums I had been in," he said. "You could really see what the black players of the time were up against."

When he returned home, Wefald read every book he could find about the Negro Baseball Leagues, which existed from 1920 to 1947.

"I read probably almost every book that has been written about it in the last 20 years or so," he said.

As he read, Wefald said he began to see the character and true spirit of the Negro Baseball Leagues that very few people know about.

"I thought this would make a very compelling movie," he said. "Nobody has ever done a movie on these great black teams."

Wefald worked closely during the next few years with Don Motley from the Negro Leagues Baseball Museum and Buck O'Neil, who played in the leagues and also was a manager.

He said the script he developed has been sent to several people in the film industry around the country.

"Ken Burns, who makes documentaries, was overjoyed that someone is trying to make a movie about these men," Wefald said.

Actor Sidney Poitier, who had read a copy of the script, called Wefald personally.

He said that though Poitier no longer acts in movies, he expressed his support for this project.

"Hopefully, in the next year or two, this project can get off the ground," Wefald said.

Director Stuart Benjamin, who owns Benjamin Productions, and is currently directing a Ray Charles film in New Orleans, is interested in the idea.

Wefald and Benjamin have talked about the project for the past two years, and in the near future it might become a reality.

Greeks win national honors

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Members of the greek community set a national record last week, winning two awards from the North American Interfraternity Conference, or NIC.

Jeff Rundle, Beta Theta Pi fraternity member and Interfraternity Council President, and Alpha Tau Omega each received NIC's Award of Distinction — one of the greek community's most prestigious awards. This is the first time two of the awards have been presented to a group and individual from the same university.

Rundle, senior in civil engineering, said he wasn't expecting the award, given by an NIC representative at the Greek Awards reception last Thursday.

"I didn't know that I was even in contention until that night," he said. "I was really surprised and obviously excited. It's certainly more recognition than I expected."

Rundle said the two distinctions say a lot about K-State's greek community.

"We have the strongest greek community in the Midwest," he said. "There were a lot of people in the room that night. It could have been multiple fraternities or individuals in the room — that's how strong the community is right now."

According to the NIC, Rundle was nominated for his outstanding leadership at Beta Theta Pi and throughout the greek community.

Although only four other individuals received the award, Rundle said he attributes his success to the abundant greek opportunities on campus.

"I've been given a lot of opportunities throughout the years at K-State, and I was fortunate enough to make the most out of those," he said. "We've been recognized as the top fraternity and sorority community the last five to six years in a row. There have been several people responsible for that within our chapters."

Bill Muir, Alpha Tau Omega's chapter adviser for the past 32 years, said the distinctions mark the first time NIC has recognized K-State in either category. He said NIC has been presenting the award — the Iron Man Trophy — from 1942 through 1971, and beginning again in 2002.

"The award recognizes K-State as a good greek system," he said. "The award is not only for us and ATO nationally as well as Jeff Rundle, but these prizes are for the entire K-State system. We wouldn't be as good as we are if the whole system wasn't good."

Muir said Alpha Tau Omega has won top fraternity honors from its national chapter for five consecutive years, but members were surprised to take the NIC's crystal and steel trophy home.

"That will be a symbol forever that we get to keep. There's the honor and distinction there," he said. "We never had any idea that we'd get to this level of recognition," he said. "It's just sort of overwhelming."

Other NIC chapter winners include the Pi Kappa Phi chapter at Texas Christian University and the Zeta Psi chapter at Nebraska Wesleyan University. Muir said the three chapters were chosen from 66 nominations.

"We're thrilled our national headquarters submitted our name as the one ATO chapter out of the 143 chapters nationwide," he said. "It says a lot."

Rundle said he wasn't surprised all chapter winners were from the Midwest region.

"Being in the Midwest, we traditionally get people who have good work ethics, a strong moral base and are very committed to whatever they choose to do," he said. "We have really excellent leadership in all of our chapters. Those leaders will recruit other leaders, and in effect, breed success."

New Aggieville store to offer gift items, floral arrangements

By Adam Lee
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

This summer there will be a new Aggieville merchant that can supply Manhattan residents with both fresh tulips and Lil' Romeo's Bar-B-Quing with honey flavored chips.

Acme Gifts, a floral and novelty store, will open next to the Hibachi Hut in Aggieville in the next couple of weeks.

The store is a new venture for Diane Meredith, owner of the Dusty Bookshelf, and David Sauter, Manhattan resident.

Meredith said the store won't be like a traditional florist, where they make arrangements for customers. Instead, Acme Gifts will be structured as a bucket shop, where the flowers are kept in water on the sales floor for customers to make their own bouquets.

"It's almost like picking flowers out of a garden," Meredith said. "And then we'll wrap them up in fun paper with pretty strings."

Meredith said they will have a variety of fresh flowers restocked several times a week. Some of the flowers will be shipped directly from overseas countries such as the Netherlands and Columbia.

"It's a weird array of wonderful things. We're trying to keep things in a lower price range, but there's a good mix."

Diane Meredith
OWNER OF DUSTY BOOKSHELF

The store also will sell unique gift items, including candy, toys, jewelry, journals and books.

"It's a weird array of wonderful things," Meredith said. "We're trying to keep things in a lower price range, but there's a good mix. Hopefully, we'll have something for everyone."

Meredith said they spent more than six months looking for interesting and unusual items around the country.

Much of their stock came from the New York Gift Show that Meredith and Sauter attended in January to look at items from more than 2,500 exhibitors.

She said other items were discovered during travel or were spotted in magazines and on the Internet.

"It's sort of like being a detective," Meredith said. "Sometimes it's hard to track some of this stuff down, but it's fun to try."

Some of the more exotic products that Meredith secured are invisible playing cards, Japanese candies and Rap Snacks, potato chips that feature Master P and his son on the bags. Meredith said she had been thinking about opening a floral store for 10 years as a way to indulge in one of her biggest pleasures.

"I thought it would be fun to have lots of beautiful flowers around me," she said.

The storefront on 12th Street is familiar territory for Meredith, who opened the Dusty Bookshelf at that location in 1985 before moving to its present location on North Manhattan Avenue.

Meredith said she is looking forward to moving in next to her old neighbors and hopes her business will add some diversity to Aggieville.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said Acme Gifts will fill a niche that hasn't been served in Aggieville.

"It's a retailer that is going to be offering something that we currently don't have in Aggieville, and that's exciting," Sieben said.

Need a magic wand to graduate on time?

Well, it may not be magic, but summer school at Wichita State can do some pretty incredible things — like make an entire semester disappear in as little as two weeks. It's not smoke and mirrors, just an easy, convenient way to get in a class or two while you're home between semesters. And as always, credits earned at WSU are easily transferable to K-State. So, take summer school at Wichita State, and in the blink of an eye you'll be closer to graduation and still have plenty of time to enjoy summer before heading back to Manhattan.

Enrollment is now open.
so check out WSU's schedule of courses on-line at www.wichita.edu/schedule or call 316-978-3090 to get a copy by mail and to find out how you can register on-line.

TO THE POINT K-State should be proud of its greek system

K-State is fortunate to have nationally recognized programs in forensics, athletics and architecture, as well as an abundance of nationally honored scholars.

But something that often goes overlooked is the stellar greek system the university boasts.

Alpha Tau Omega fraternity and Interfraternity President Jeff Rundle recently were awarded awards of distinction by the North American Interfraternity Conference, the highest award a group or individual can receive. The greek system at K-State also has won top honors from the Mid-American Greek Council Association throughout much of the last decade.

It is a greek system like no other in the Midwest and perhaps the nation. Its philanthropic efforts raised more money for St. Jude's Children's Hospital than any other greek system in the country.

While other campuses question the integrity of their greek systems, K-State's greek community has strived through its rigorous programming to provide opportunities for individuals to achieve greatness and to serve the community.

We congratulate the greek community on a job well done.

THE CHALLENGE OF LOVE

Romance best left up to spontaneity

Have you ever been in an elevator when it stops on a floor so some girl can get on, and you do that raise-the-eyebrows thing to the elevator newbie. It's like you're saying the Jerry Seinfeld line, "I see ya, but I've got nothing to say to ya, welcome to the area."

So then, of course, there's also the sidewalk encounter as you pass someone. If you're not totally oblivious, and maybe a little outgoing, you muster a "hello," "hi," or "what's up?" But what makes this so strange is the expectation and response. You've got to recognize the situation here. No one is about to stop suddenly and talk — you can't meet and greet on the go.

That would be weird. So you need to make it quick while making sure not to stumble over your mouth or left foot.

According to random-girl-I-see-on-my-way-to-places etiquette, the following is bound to happen, short of risking the bizarre:

First, there must be an exchange of smiles from the approaching person and yourself. Treat this as a safeguard from getting the shaft from an unsuspecting, uninviting person.

This goes hand in hand with establishing eye contact. This is tricky because if you can see each other from afar, it's critical you gauge the right amount of contact.

So how much is too much? Well, it's best just to take control of the situation and show your confidence.

The power of eye contact should not be underestimated. It shows attention, and we all know ladies like attention.

Just be sure not to come off as a never-blinking, crazy-eyed guy she doesn't know with a creepy smile.

That could induce the subtle panic gesture of simply pretending that you're not there and that she doesn't see you.

"Who are you fooling? I know you saw me!"

Under no circumstances is that anything but inner monologue, unless you like the nickname "sexual predator."

Now that we're past the expectations and dangers of random contact, all that's left is the conversation itself.

The response to any of the short greetings is never anything more than the other person taking your "hello" or "what's up?" and using it on you. If you're in this situation, and someone says, "what's up?" and you respond with, "not much, what about you?" you blew it.

By the time all those words are out, she's on to bigger and better things five feet down the sidewalk.

As another reminder of your failure, you get the feeling of, "hey, she really didn't want to talk to me." As opposed to the successful feeling of, "she smiled while repeating my words ... was there a spark there? ... I don't know ... maybe"

At least with the latter, your thoughts are occupied with the delusional messages of, "Good job, man. Initiating the conversation is half the battle. She'll be back for more next time I get out of my class early and walk down Denison Avenue."

If there's anything we've learned from this,

ZACH HAUSER

WHAT'S UP BABY.

Illustration by Adam Hayes | COLLEGIAN

it's that this is way too labored and impersonal to meet anyone. I prefer to leave my chance meetings to spontaneity.

For example, I was walking home from class in the pouring rain, changing wet Collegians after the water started to eat through the paper and onto my face.

I stopped by the Natatorium to pick up a new one and donate my old one to some nearby landfill, when this girl stops me from heading back out into the rain and gives me her umbrella saying she has a ride coming.

She just handed it to me, saying that I'll need it more than she will.

I'm thinking to myself how amazing this is, so I thank her for her kindness, and we talk for a couple seconds and exchange names.

Now through all this, I'm trying to follow my random-girl-I-see-on-my-way-to-places etiquette.

Then, I start toward home with a red umbrella and a smile on my face. Maybe I'll send her flowers with a card that says, "what's up" with my phone number and her umbrella and see what happens.

CAMPUS FOURUM | 395-4444

Hey, Collegian and Royal Purple, when are you gonna give K-State-Salina some respect? I mean, really, c'mon guys, get it together.

I think that girl with the paper sack on her head in yesterday's Collegian was hot. I think more girls should try that out.

K-State's flag team's going to nationals and all we read about in the Collegian is baseball's losing. Nice job again, Collegian.

We should get Larry Eustachy to coach the baseball team.

If women were meant to play football, God would've put their boobs somewhere else.

Every time I hear an American denouncing another American for using the right to free speech to voice an opinion that is contrary to that of the President and the government, one name always seems to come to mind: Joe McCarthy. Any of you people remember who he was?

How am I supposed to get ready for my finals when I have three tests this week? Nice dead week.

Greeks give up alcohol? That's like dormrats giving up video games.

I was just looking at the pictures of my friend's bachelor party from last year, and I'll be damned, Larry Eustachy was there, and we had strippers!

Thinking of Paul makes me want to drink alcohol. Go Nemaha County.

I want a Larry Eustachy mask for Halloween.

Paul, fess up. You don't have a girlfriend.

OK, so hook me up with that hot furniture store delivery boy.

I think it's really great that you K-State boys think that our capri pants are ugly and they suck, but we don't wear them for you.

Paul Restivo, we're really sad you're resigning because you're the column we actually read in the Collegian.

El Roberson, please stop touching my ta-tas at the

I just want to say thanks to J.D., D.J., the Llama, Doc, Boss, Shorty, and Tad. Thanks for making my senior year a year to remember. I'll always remember you guys. Go Big Cats!

El Roberson? More like Pito Taquito.

Sometimes I think in my thoughts, and they make me laugh.

To my fine-piece-of-meat roommate that tapes his buttohole every night: Please stop buying the cheap tape. It's starting to make me chafe a little down there.

17 years and 16 losses in one season? You do the math. That equals one crappy coach.

Zach Hauser is the sexiest man alive.

Why is it that I always get looked down upon when I have an all-girls threesome? Really, what's the big deal? You would love to see it.

You know it's bad when you're sitting here watching your friend taste-test condoms.

Samsonite! I was way off.

OK, to all the Johnson County people: I'm from Westchester County, New York, the No. 1 richest county in the United States, so eat it.

HALO with shields is like extended pleasure condoms. It gets old really fast.

How can K-State ever hope to be one of the top 10-ranked land-grant universities in the nation when we don't even have an educational radio station signal anymore?

The average IQ and the mean life expectancy of the average American citizen recently passed each other, going in the opposite direction.

Eli, I forgot you. Thanks to you, too. Go Big Cats!

Classy Cats, equestrian and Independence. Isn't it funny how the hottest girls from those three groups are all from Lawrence?

Brand new computer: $1,000. Dorm Internet connection fee: $150. The look on your roommate's face after you catch him wanking it to porn: Priceless.

I am so crazy about your taco-flavored kisses.

I woke up and the duct tape was gone!

Yeah, let's stop all the comments about Nemaha County and get back to making fun of Johnson County again. Thank you.

Hey, guys, it's hot outside, but please leave your pants on.

Either I'm getting progressively cooler or other people are getting progressively dumber, because all my comments have been getting into the Fourum lately.

Y'all are just jealous because you know Nemaha County's better than you.

Is it me or are the only good-looking people on campus from Nemaha County?

80 percent of all statistics are made up.

To the person who wanted the convenience store person to give them the penny: If you don't have the money, don't buy it.

To the blonde girl I met at Silverado's: I'm pregnant.

90 percent of all guys masturbate. The other 10 percent don't have arms.

To the girl I took home: I feel very, very lucky. With a case of herpes like mine, I thought I'd never do that again.

I went to my family reunion in Nemaha County and one of my cousins showed up in an oversized wool sweater. She was the first to be asked to dance.

Can we stop the jokes about Nemaha County and go back to more important things, like fraternities, sororities and Johnson County?

Ryan, where's my passport?

I wish Kramer's management could be more like Derby's.

Bar, station to give away prizes

By Amy Link
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Some will win and others will just be wet at Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon and Rusty's Outback tonight.

KACZ-FM 96.3 and Rusty's have teamed up to give away more than $1,300 worth of prizes.

Larry Lay, program director for Z-96.3, said that to win prizes, people will have to catch a water balloon that is thrown off of the roof of Rusty's Last Chance and onto Rusty's Outback patio. If they are able to catch the balloon without it breaking, the contestant will win a prize.

Win or get wet

KACZ-FM 96.3, along with Rusty's Last Chance and Outback are giving away $1,300 worth of prizes beginning at 7 p.m. at Rusty's in Aggieville.

"It's an opportunity to win or get wet," Lay said.

April Dodder, sales manager for Z-96.3, said the promotion will begin at 7 p.m. with Bill Michaels broadcasting live from Rusty's Last Chance and Rusty's Outback. Registration for a chance to win will begin at 9 p.m.

At 10 p.m., names will be drawn to see who will be the contestants. For the next hour, Michaels will throw the balloons off to the roof to the applicants who will be in the patio area. As the contestants step up to take their turns, Michaels will draw the prize they will be competing for.

Dodder said there will be about 50 balloons thrown with a number of good prizes. She said the two most valuable prizes are a Deluxe X-Box complete with two games and an extra controller provided by Radio Shack. Other prizes include a car stereo from HB Stereo and gift certificates to local businesses.

If the balloon breaks, contestants will still win a prize from Budweiser, the event's sponsor, Dodder said.

Lay said this was the radio station's third promotion event of the year. He said they chose Rusty's Last Chance and Outback to be host to the event because it was in a nice, central location.

Lay said Rusty Wilson, owner of the bar, was happy to comply.

"He was the first person we approached, and he jumped at the chance," he said. "Also, with the patio he has, it provides the perfect space."

Wilson said he was excited about the event but has had a more hands-off approach.

"They came to me with the idea. It is completely their promotion," he said.

Wilson said he was happy they chose his business for the event.

Lay said the promotion will be fun for everyone.

"We are really excited about this event," he said. "We're hopeful students turn out."

DONOR | Friends, colleagues of graduate student ask for donations

South Asians," Motipalli said. Motipalli said chances of a match are one in 20,000 for Vidya — a chance most likely found in minorities.

"Right now there are only 50,000 registered donors for minorities in a national registry of over 3 billion," he said. "That's why there is such a need for minorities to donate. Vidya will most likely match a person of the same ethnic race, so this drive is targeted toward minorities."

Ganti said the drive is free for all minorities, including Asian/Pacific Islanders, African-Americans, Latinos, Native Americans and others. He said those willing to donate should be between 18 and 60 years old, in good health, free of chronic diseases, at low risk of general anesthesia, not excessively overweight and have no tattoos obtained in the past year.

"Participants will just fill out a form and then be tested," he said. "The whole process will only take about five or 10 minutes."

Ganti said the testing requires only four to five drops of blood and doesn't require any surgical procedures.

Karri said that if there is a preliminary match, additional blood tests will be scheduled. If a perfect match results and the donor agrees to a transplantation, about 1,000 mL, or 5 percent, of bone marrow is extracted from the hip. He said there is no health risk involved.

"Donated bone marrow replaces itself in two weeks, and it takes about half an hour or 45 minutes of surgery for the transplant. And in most cases, you leave the next day with just a little soreness," he said.

Evan Semón | COLLEGIAN

Vidya Nanduri sits and listens as his friends plan for a bone marrow drive that will take place from 11 a.m. to 7 p.m. Friday in the K-State Student Union's Little Theatre.

"It's a great chance to save a life."

Vidya said he hopes for a good turnout, regardless of whether a match is found.

"It's not just for me," he said. "There are a lot of people around who don't have their matches."

Gosavi, however, said those who are tested at the drive should be ready to donate.

"This has a commitment to donate marrow if there is a match. Otherwise, that's just false hope for the person hoping to receive the bone marrow," he said.

"Personally, I don't see a reason for a person to shy away from saving a life. There's no chance I wouldn't take the opportunity to save a life."

Gosavi said he would encourage people thinking of donating to send an e-mail to a member of the group.

"We're trying to get an idea of how many we should expect," he said.

Karri said SAMAR is paying for all donating fees and refreshments for minorities, and the Society for the Appreciation of Bharadiya Heritage and Arts, or SABAA, will pay for the location.

"We're hoping as many people as possible help out," he said.

"Without funding and a donor, treatment won't be possible."

Vidya said he is grateful for everyone's support.

"I just want to thank everyone who is concerned about me, has helped me," he said.

"I want to thank my department, professors and advisers for their support and my friends for all the hard work they've done during my treatment."

Treatment that is far from over.

Gosavi said that even if the biopsy comes back positive, there is always a chance for a relapse, and therefore the need for a donor.

"It would be like having a life saver with you," he said.

"Once you find a bone marrow match, you're ready to face a relapse. Without it, you just have to cross your fingers."

Columnist responds to written criticism

Columnists expect to get responses.

And believe me, this year I've had plenty.

Whether it was an angry fan from an opposing school during the clash of the columnist Gameday series or a

K-State alum giving me a pat on the back, these responses have been very, very interesting.

It is, of course, the Collegian's policy to never respond to these e-mails and letters.

I thought for my final column here at the Collegian, I would respond to some of those individuals.

But before I started to comb through all of the old e-mails, I figured it would be better to use my last column for stirring up trouble.

So I figured a thank-you note would be in order.

First of all, I would like to thank all of the Collegian guys.

Especially Sean Purcell.

Without "Spurcell's" help and guidance, I wouldn't be writing today.

See, Mr. Purcell, as I always refer to him, was so impressed by my writing ability that he hired me on staff during the fall.

Actually, Purcell was just hooking a friend up. See, Sean and I went to school together back at Prairie Hills Middle School and Buhler High School. We survived eighth grade basketball and football together and then awed our competitors in freshman and sophomore basketball at BHS.

Like the whole team, Spurcell and I have never forgotten Coach Adkins' rallying cry, "Balls to the wall, B-Team Basketball!"

And I can't forget to thank your pet dog, either, Sean. Otis inspired me, but I still haven't figured out how exactly.

Thank you, also, Dan Smith.

You have improved my writing substantially and put up with me getting my column to you past the 1 p.m. suggestion, or as you call it, "deadline."

Tom Fontana and Joel Reichenberger, both of you share that deep purple passion for the Cats, as well as plenty of stories of K-State yesteryear. Besides, anyone who remembers Jeff Kelly and Paul Watson is cool in my book.

Speaking of Wildcat football greats, thank you, also, Ben Fehr.

During the annual Collegian-Royal Purple football game, you showed the heart of a champion.

When you dislocated your knee on the frozen tundra just east of President Jon Wefald's house while trying to punch the ball across the line for six, you provided lore for future generations.

Collegian football teams in the future will always rally to the cry of "Win one for Fehr."

And let me tell you, Fehr, if making your kneecap look like a Picasso painting doesn't get you coverage in the Royal Purple, I don't know what would.

Thanks also to everyone else on staff that are too numerous to thank individually, unless I want this column to resemble an Academy Awards acceptance speech.

I also have to thank the K-State student athletes and coaching staffs for giving us sports writers at the Collegian exciting games and compelling stories to write about.

Thank you, also, to the readers of the Collegian, specifically the student body and the university's great alumni.

It was a great experience getting to write columns for thousands of people who are "faithful to colors" and "fighting, ever fighting, for a Wildcat victory."

GO STATE!

Golf team earns No. 18 seed to NCAA Central Regional; lineup same as Big 12 Championships

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A sixth-place finish in the Big 12 Championships was good enough to move on.

Following K-State's best-ever finish in the Columbia, Mo., tournament, the Cats play at 7:30 a.m. today at the Firethorn Golf Club in Lincoln, Neb., for the NCAA Central Regional.

Coach Kristi Knight wasn't sure whether her team would receive a bid to the regional, but K-State earned a No. 18 seed and its third straight trip.

"It's an accomplishment for the team," Knight said. "There's only 63 teams that get invited to regionals. I felt pretty good about getting in, but you never know until it's official. We're definitely excited to be part of this."

The same lineup that went to Columbia will represent K-State. Senior Miranda Smith will join juniors Christine Boucher and Karen Quintelier along with sophomores Stephanie Limoges and Sarah Heffel.

Knight said using the same lineup has a lot of advantages.

"This time of year, it's common not to have a lot of lineup changes," she said. "These are the players that right now are our

Tennis team to travel north to challenge Big 10 champions

By Wes Marfield
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Looking to finish its magical season on a high note, K-State tennis goes north this weekend for a match with 19th-ranked Northwestern in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

The match is slated for a 10 a.m. start Saturday in Evanston, Ill., at the Vandy Christie Tennis Center.

Northwestern, Big 10 regular season and tournament champions, comes into the tournament on a five-match winning streak that dates back to April 19.

They also feature the Big 10 Player of the Year in freshman Cristelle Grier, 23-0 this spring and ranked ninth in the latest national poll.

Coach Steve Bietau said his team has a tough road ahead of it if the Wildcats want to make it past the first round of the tournament for the first time in seven years.

"Northwestern is a great team," Bietau said. "They have a lot of talent and great coaching, and they've been one of the most successful programs in the country over the last five years."

The only match K-State has ever won in the NCAA Tournament was in 1996, the team's first ever trip, when they shut out Utah 5-0. That was as far as the Wildcats got, having suffered a 5-4 loss to Kansas in the second round.

Bietau has been stressing doubles play all season, and nothing is changing this weekend. His No. 1 duo of Petra Sedlmajerova and Paulina Castillejos has won four of its last six, boosting them into the national rankings last week at No. 56.

"The doubles will always be important — just because it comes first," Bietau said. "It's something that has become a strength for our team, and you always feel better when you get the doubles point."

K-State has never beaten Northwestern in three tries. The last time the two teams met was in 1998, when Northwestern won 8-1.

It came like a bolt of lightning. It hit hard, and then it disappeared.

The shock of Coach Mike Clark's resignation was tough to swallow for the Wildcats, said junior third baseman Zack Saunders. Yet a day later, it was back to business.

"It was a little rough," he said. "We didn't know what to expect. But we dealt with it really good and just went on with our day like nothing happened."

Something might have happened, though. The players, struggling through a season of injury and disappointment, finally found something to play for.

"People have given their heads a shake a little more," said junior pitcher Jim Ripley, "and looked a little deeper"

That mentality surfaced as the Wildcats scrapped to the last out in a 2-0 loss to Wichita State on Tuesday night at Tointon Family Stadium.

"I'm so proud of them," Clark said, "the way they went out there and fought."

But the coaching world, and those close to K-State baseball, remain equally proud of Clark. When he returned to his office after his resignation, he found more than 100 e-mails awaiting him.

"It was unbelievable," he said Tuesday night. "I couldn't get any work done in the office. It'll take time for me to return everything, but I'll get something back to everybody."

NBA | Wizards cut ties with Jordan
Imagine that, an NBA team showing Michael Jordan the door.

The Washington Wizards abruptly dumped basketball's most popular figure Wednesday, ending a relationship that produced much fanfare but little success over 3 1/2 seasons.

Disappointed with the team's poor record and embarrassed by infighting on and off the court, owners Abe Pollin and Ted Leonsis told Jordan about their decision in a short morning meeting at the team's arena.

College basketball | ISU coach named soon
Iowa State athletic officials were silent Wednesday about plans for hiring a successor to Larry Eustachy as public speculation over the Cyclones' next coach intensified.

Athletic director Bruce Van De Velde has declined to comment on details of the search or to name leading candidates to fill the job held by Eustachy the last five years.

"We will have something to say soon," Tom Kroeschell, sports information director, said Wednesday.

Eustachy resigned Monday, one week after the publication of photos of him drinking and kissing women at a college fraternity party in Columbia, Mo., after a game.

Olympics | IOC wants new Iraqi leadership
The IOC wants a new Olympic committee in Iraq with no links to the group that was accused of torturing and jailing athletes during Saddam Hussein's rule.

The IOC's ethics commission urged the move Wednesday after investigating accusations against the Iraqi committee once led by Saddam's older son, Odai.

The committee's Baghdad headquarters largely were destroyed in U.S.-led bombing raids early in the Iraq war. There have been no confirmed sightings of Saddam or Odai since the collapse of the regime.

NBA | Trail Blazers' GM steps down
Trail Blazers general manager Bob Whitsitt resigned Wednesday, days after the team ended a season marked by legal troubles, suspensions and infighting, sources said.

Whitsitt, who held the position for eight years, will retain his job as president of the Seattle Seahawks. The Trail Blazers and the Seahawks are owned by Microsoft pioneer Paul Allen.

The Trail Blazers went 376-248 during Whitsitt's tenure.

NBA | League announces All-Rookie team
Rookie of the Year Amare Stoudemire and No. 1 overall draft choice Yao Ming were unanimous choices for the NBA All-Rookie team announced Wednesday.

Phoenix forward Stoudemire, who entered the league straight from high school, and Houston center Yao both received the maximum 56 points in balloting by the league's head coaches.

Miami's Caron Butler (55 points), Orlando's Drew Gooden (45) and Denver's Nene Hilario (40) also made the team.

NBA | Hornets' GM takes Penn State job
Hornets general manager Jeff Bower resigned Wednesday to become an assistant coach at Penn State.

The moves comes three days after the Hornets fired coach Paul Silas and his assistants.

Bower has been with the Hornets for six seasons, two as GM. He'll stay with the team through the NBA draft June 26.

MLB | Phillies to auction pieces of stadium
Who would spend $280 for a pair of uncomfortable blue plastic seats? Phillies fans, that's who — and anyone else interested in pro sports memorabilia.

The Philadelphia Phillies are planning to auction off bits and pieces of Veterans Stadium after the baseball season, including lockers, signs, dugout benches and swatches of artificial turf.

The Phillies are financially responsible for demolishing the Vet and hope to recoup some of the costs through the sale of stadium memorabilia. The 32-year-old concrete bowl is scheduled to come down early next year as the Phillies and Eagles move into new stadiums nearby.

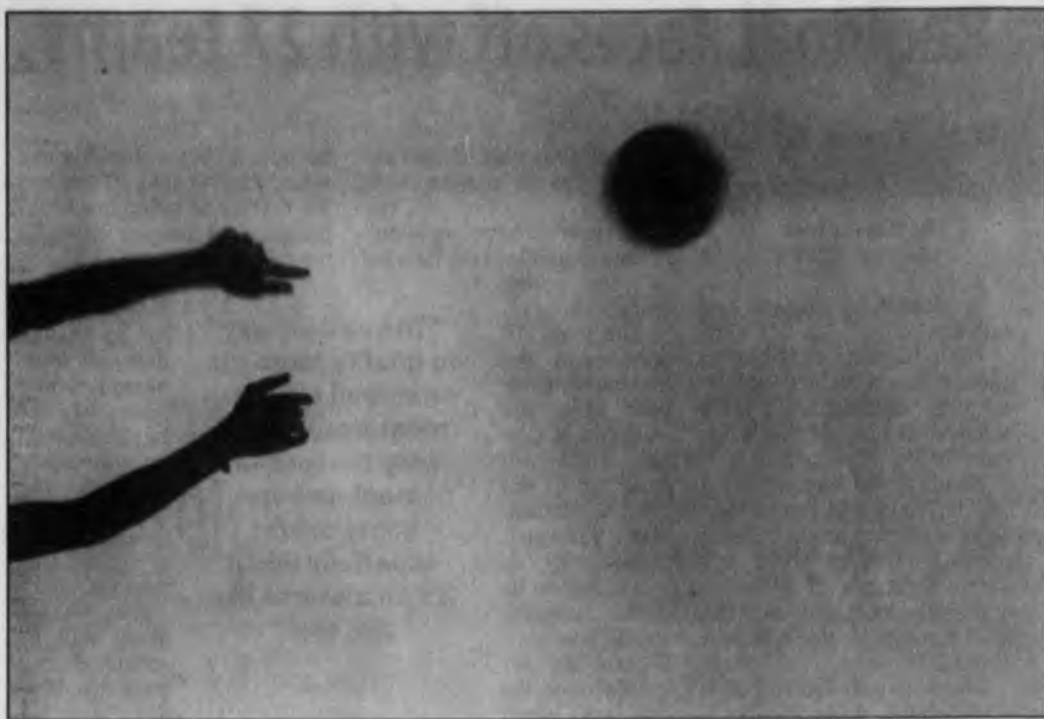

Tennis | Roddick bounced at Italian Open
Andy Roddick was eliminated from the Italian Open on Wednesday, beaten by a player he had no trouble defeating at last year's U.S. Open.

Dutch qualifier Martin Verkerk downed the fifth-seeded American 6-7 (6), 6-3, 6-4 in the second round.

In a match between strong servers, Verkerk had 22 aces to Roddick's 13.

In their only other meeting, Roddick won in straight sets at the U.S. Open. This time, the 68th-ranked Verkerk was in control, moving his opponent from side to side.

their free will that nobody forced them to do it or to live in any way against their will. It is their true attitude toward Saddam Hussein," the speaker said.

The speech is interrupted once by coughing and twice by what sounds like water being drunk, the newspaper reported.

Asked Wednesday about the tape, White House press secretary Ari Fleischer said: "We don't know if the tape is genuine or not. It's being studied. We don't know if he's alive or not."

Last week, the London based Al-Quds Al-Arabi newspaper said it received a statement from Saddam urging Iraqis to "rise up" against occupation. To reporters familiar with other documents attributed to Saddam, neither the handwriting nor the signature appeared similar, but the newspaper said sources close to Saddam confirmed both were genuine.

Saddam's fate is not known. He was targeted by cruise missiles March 20 in the opening salvo of the war. As U.S. troops converged on Baghdad, American jets dropped bombs on the al-Mansour neighborhood April 7 after Saddam reportedly was seen there.

Some Iraqis claimed to have seen Saddam in the Azamiyah district two days later — an appearance that was videotaped and broadcast by Abu Dhabi television. Some U.S. officials dispute the authenticity of that tape.

The latest tape fell into the hands of a reporter for the Sydney newspaper who was approached by two men near the Palestine Hotel. The men asked where to find Al-Jazeera or Al-Arabiya.

When the reporter's translator pointed toward the hotel and the security cordon manned by coalition forces, one of the men handed the tape over to the translator, saying it was his duty, as an Iraqi, to make sure the tape was made public.

The translator said the men spoke with the distinctive accents of Saddam's Tikrit region.

SYRIA | Officials deny hiding weapons for Iraq simply repeated that the international community would be forced to act.

During the war in Iraq the United States accused Syria of granting haven to fleeing officials of Saddam's regime and developing its own weapons of mass destruction. The allegations triggered fears of another U.S.-led conflict even before the smoke cleared in Iraq.

The Syrian ambassador to Spain, Mohsen Bilal, denied the allegations of offering haven or possessing such terror weapons.

"We have no fear and no secrets," Bilal told journalists Wednesday.

Rice gave the interviews ahead of a visit to Washington Wednesday by Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar.

Secretary of State Colin Powell met in Damascus Saturday with Syrian President Bashar Assad to discuss weapons of mass destruction and U.S. plans for the Middle East in the aftermath of the war in Iraq.

Powell said on Sunday that the Bush administration and Congress are monitoring Syria's moves.

"There are no illusions in his (Assad's) mind as to what we are looking for from Syria," Powell told NBC's "Meet the Press."

"There was, as we put it in diplomatic terms, a candid exchange of views, but it is not promises that we are interested in, or assurances, but it is action. We will see what happens in the days, weeks, months ahead."

A key question involving Iraq, Powell said, is whether Syria will keep its eastern border closed, and track down and surrender any Iraqi suspects who might cross it to escape prosecution.

Bilal, the Syrian envoy, said lasting peace in the Middle East depends on a "total retreat" by Israel from the territories it seized in the 1967 war.

Referring to the "road map" to peace put forward by the United States, the United Nations, the European Union and Russia, Bilal said it should go beyond the dispute between the Palestinians and Israel.

"We have an Arab-Israeli conflict," Bilal said. He said that once Israel accepted the right of Palestinian refugees to return and returned to the 1967 boundaries, "all Arab countries will be willing to sign a peace treaty with Israel. Total retreat in exchange for total peace." Israel opposes the return of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians refugees, saying it would destroy the Jewish state.

In the 1967 war, Israel captured the West Bank and the eastern part of Jerusalem from Jordan, the Gaza Strip and Sinai Peninsula from Egypt, and the Golan Heights from Syria. The Sinai Peninsula was returned to Egypt after Israel and Egypt signed a peace treaty in 1979. Israel has declared east Jerusalem part of its territory and still controls the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, although the Palestinian Authority is in charge of the cities in both areas.

Israel also has annexed the Golan Heights, but that move and the annexation of east Jerusalem have not been recognized under international law. Peace talks between Israel and Syria broke down in 1999.

Bilal said Assad told Powell that for Syria to support the road map, the return of the Golan Heights would have to be added to the peace plan.

Powell is expected to travel to Israel and several other Middle East countries next weekend in an attempt to sell the "road map," which aims to establish a Palestinian state by 2005.

BASEBALL | Team hopes for positive end to season

One would think the onslaught of well-wishers would be a distraction as Clark coaches the final six games of his K-State career. But that's not the way Clark works, senior Tim Doty said.

"It's the exact same as before. He hasn't changed anything, and I don't think he will," he said.

For 17 years, Clark has been the steady influence on K-State baseball. Seventeen years of fresh recruits have become Wildcats, and 17 years of Wildcats have graduated.

After 17 years of routine, Clark said there's no reason to change now.

"We're going to try to get things done the same they always have been," he said. "I know the players understand and respect that. We're going to try to finish this thing off on the right note."

Clark still has a waver in his voice when he talks about the end, and even more so when he talks about his players. But ending on the right note, he said, means standing by his decision.

"It probably feels better than Monday," he said. "But today it's still the right thing."

Men's golf to play host to NCAA Regional, faces off with 27 teams

Wildcats earn 1st bid since 1993 season

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

A decadelong drought has ended.

After 10 years of failing to make it into a NCAA Regional, the K-State men's golf team received its first bid this week since 1993.

Not only did they receive a bid, but they get the advantages of playing on their home course - Colbert Hills. The Cats will be one of 27 teams that will compete in the NCAA Central Regional on May 15-17.

Head Coach Tim Norris said this is what his team played for all season.

"It means a lot," he said. "We obviously want to expose our course to the rest of college golf, but part of that exposure was us playing well, too."

"I know the guys are awfully excited and looking forward to the challenge."

The top 10 teams and the low two individuals after the weekend at Colbert Hills will move on to the NCAA Nationals in Stillwater, Okla.

Playing on its home course should give K-State an advantage over the field, but Colbert Hills can frustrate even the players that play it often.

"I felt like us hosting would be added motivation for our team," Norris said. "They can see that we're trying to get our program to another level, or on the national level."

"The easiest way to qualify to go to the national tournament would be to play the tournament on your home course," he said, "especially when it's on a course like this one."

The 54-hole event will be stretched out over the three days, with 18 holes being played each day. Play will begin at 7 a.m. all three days and admission is free.

"The easiest way to qualify to go the national tournament would be to play the tournament on your home course, especially when it's on a course like this one."

five best players. They give us the best chance at being successful at this event."

The Cats finished 15th in both 2001 and 2002. Last season, K-State got off to a poor start in the opening two rounds, firing a 325 and a 326. Knight said if the Cats are to be successful this season, they will have to be significantly better in the early rounds.

"We dug a hole in the first round in the last two years," Knight said. "You can't win a position for nationals in the first round, but you can certainly shoot yourself out of it. The first two times we've come to this event, we have not gotten off to a solid start."

"That's what we're looking for here. A nice solid start and be competitive in the first round and go from there."

If K-State hopes to advance to nationals, it will have to finish in the top eight as a team. The tournament will take place May 20-23 and will be hosted by Purdue at the Birch Boilermaker Golf Complex in West Lafayette, Ind.

The Central Regional will be host to a strong field. Six of the 20 teams heading to Lincoln are ranked in the top 20 of the current Golfweek/Sagrain ratings, led by California.

"We can't control what the other 20 teams are going to do," Knight said. "But I think if we go out and the girls stay out of the way of themselves and fall back on their instincts and what they've worked on in practice, then when we add it all up, we'll have had a nice day."

"It will take three good rounds. Once you get to regionals, it's a tough field. It won't be easy by any means."

regional that isn't a conference champion, Bietau said that is something he isn't too concerned about.

"I really haven't looked at it that way, and I really haven't compared it to any of the other regionals," Bietau said. "My concern is that our team play as best as we can in our regional."

Claire Pollard, Northwestern's coach, is a longtime friend of Bietau's.

The two had both served on the NCAA Tennis Committee together.

He said he has nothing but respect for her and what she's done at Northwestern.

"I respect the way Claire thinks as a coach," Bietau said. "She's a great player - NCAA champ in doubles - and what she's done with the program at Northwestern is something that anyone would be proud of."

THE FOUR BIGGEST DIETING MISTAKES

By Rick Tague, M.D., M.P.H.
Board Certified in Medical Weight Management

If you made a New Year's resolution to lose weight but have struggled...or have already failed...you are not alone.

Numerous studies show that over 96% of all self-imposed diets fail to bring about a significant long-term weight loss. Regardless of how much willpower you have, the odds are against you when dieting on your own. And with less than a 4% chance of long-term success, you may ask, "why even try?"

Fortunately, a medical specialty called bariatric medicine has discovered simple, easy-to-follow solutions to the four biggest dieting mistakes. The biggest dieting mistakes are:

1. Using a "cookie cutter" approach to choosing your diet. I call this the "one size fits all" diet. No one gains weight...or loses weight...the same way. In order to be successful your program must be individualized around your personal needs, your likes and dislikes, your medical needs, your family history, your environment, your level of stress and more. Unfortunately, fad diets call for everyone to follow the same diet forever which accounts for such a dismal success rate.
2. No medical monitoring of your weight loss. This may lead to losing muscle and even bone versus losing body fat. Losing muscle causes your metabolism to slow down and contributes greatly to eventual weight regain and makes losing weight "the next time" even more difficult. Weight loss must be medically monitored to insure that what you are eating - how often and at what times during the day - causes you to melt away fat...not muscle.
3. Attempting to fight the "cravings battle" alone. Let's face it, cravings can be an almost impossible "enemy" to fight. The reason is that cravings are hardwired into your body's natural self-protection system.

Brain chemicals causing cravings is one of the ways your body preserves itself from starvation. Of course changing your eating habits by dieting doesn't mean you are starving, but your body doesn't know that. Fortunately, using an individualized high nutrient program, adjusting meal frequency, and other medical techniques including appetite suppressants (when appropriate and only if needed), can eliminate cravings which then makes losing unwanted fat pounds easy.

4. Not recognizing there may be underlying medical reasons causing your weight gain. Obviously fad diets do not address your individual medical history nor do they evaluate and monitor blood and lab findings that can provide quick answers to your past difficulty with losing weight. A physician specializing in medical weight management is able to identify and correct hormonal imbalances and other medical problems that can be the key to a slimmer you.

Losing weight doesn't have to be an uphill battle, and more than likely past failures haven't been your fault. An individual's genetics, metabolism, medical problems, life stresses and food cravings can make weight loss on your own a very difficult undertaking. Make sure any program you undertake avoids these four common mistakes.

Also, seek a medical doctor who specializes in nutrition and medical weight management. Not all physicians have this specialized training. And if you'd like more information about how you can finally achieve weight loss success, please call my office today at 776-4443 to set up a complimentary office visit.

Toy exhibit to display undergrad's art project

By J. Scott Bowman
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Toys don't normally have a deeper meaning to them.

That is what makes Randy Regier's toys different. With vintage-style toys with names like "Shokor X-7 the Shocking Robot," the toys are more than just playthings. They are created to spark enough interest in people that they explore the message they possess, Regier, senior in fine arts, said.

"The thing I've found out is that toys are like a Trojan Horse," Regier said. "I hope they intrigue people enough to read the fine print on their boxes. People are disarmed by a toy. It's like a hook. They don't expect to see a message, but it's there."

Regier said he has restored antique toys for years and was a mechanic for 10 years. He said those experiences were valuable to get him to where he is today. He said the time spent around toys helped him figure out how old toys looked and their themes.

Regier said he originally started making toys for a 3D design class. Regier is the cartoonist for "Gongfarmers." He said that using a cartoonist mind, he got excited about building things and thought it would be fun to build a toy.

"The first toy I made, which was 'Space Tractor,' I made as a joke," Regier said. "I never intended for it to be art, but other people do. The main thing was that I wanted to get other people to have a response to it."

It's the levels of meaning and interest that intrigues some people, Dane Webster, assistant professor of photography, said. He said the fact that Regier, 38, is an older student means he has experience with life and constructing objects that other students might not possess.

"I think his experience as an older student and mechanic benefits his sculpture work," Webster said. "The main thing is that when people first see the work, it's the playful construction that captures them."

"But some of the toys have darker undertones that address racism and national problems that makes it intriguing for the artgoer."

Webster said his favorite piece in the collection is the "Elektrischerseebot."

"I really enjoy the electric submarine, I forget the pseudo-German name he used for it, but it has such a playful quality," Webster said. "I think it's the fact that it's a model submarine that I know that he fabricated from old rain gutters. It's just interesting."

Regier said his work is a response of advertising and offering a reality that isn't really there. He said toys seem to pave the way for children's perception on reality and that is what he's playing off of when he makes toys.

"For example, I created toys like 'The Dead and Dying' as a response to little plastic army men," Regier said. "They're always standing and looking glorious, and if they get knocked down, you just stand them back up. None of them are dead."

"It's like the beer ads that are glorious. So I decided to make something to counterbalance that."

MORE THAN LOOKS

Experience, personality also influences for attraction

By Rachel Krier
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

From across the room he spots her and suddenly, he's in a trance, being pulled in by her tractor beam. OK, it doesn't really happen like that, but maybe Wayne and Garth didn't have it all wrong.

They had at least two of the five criteria for going from attraction to long-term relationship. The first step depends on proximity, said Tony Jurich, professor of marriage and family therapy.

"The first thing you have to have is propinquity, which means closeness," Jurich said. "You're probably not going to fall in love with someone in Mongolia, because you won't meet them."

So if Mongolia is out, the more reasonable places to expect attraction are at work, school and regular hang-outs, Jurich said.

Next, there does have to be a certain amount of physical attraction, Jurich said, though people's definitions of physical beauty varies widely.

Jurich said people's physical attraction are a continuum between classic beauty and the exotic, and different people slide along the continuum depending on their personal experience, preference and even culture.

Susan Fabrey, senior in psychology, said she is more attracted to people who look different. This type of physical attraction probably would be categorized as exotic.

"I like people who are different, both mentally and physically, who just don't look like the rest of the masses," Fabrey said. "I am usually attracted to opposite, but similar. Like, I'm outgoing, and I'm attracted to people who are outgoing, but we might be different in a lot of other ways."

The third step in attraction is finding similarities and common interests, which is why people date or marry within their field of interest, Jurich said.

Brian Anderson, senior in golf course management, said similarities in background and upbringing have been beneficial in his marriage.

"It's easier to connect and understand where they're coming from if you've had similar experiences," Anderson said. "It helps the comfort level. Neither one of you feels out of place."

However, there has to be a balance of similarities and differences, a concept called complementarity, Jurich said.

"If you find someone exactly like you, then you'll hate them because they are exactly like you," Jurich said. "You want to find someone that you can contribute to, and they can contribute to you. It's called reciprocity — filling each others' needs."

As if finding just the right balance of similarities and differences isn't complicated enough, the final step in transitioning from attraction to relationship is emotional attachment. Although there is a term for this, limerence, it's not easily defined or explained, Jurich said.

"Our emotions tend to be experienced, not talked about," Jurich said. "We see it with our parents, on TV, in movies. We pick up little hints. We draw from our experiences, the media, real life and trial and error."

Anderson can attest to this, as he said it was difficult for him to explain to other people how he felt when they asked if he was ready for marriage.

"Did I know? Yes, I knew she was the one," he said. "How did I know? I don't know."

Anderson has known his wife since fifth grade, although they didn't start dating until after high school, he said.

They have been married for four months, which Anderson said the relationship takes much more effort than the initial attraction.

"Attraction is pretty simple. It comes naturally. I don't know what all goes into it, but we are all attracted to people on a daily basis," Anderson said.

"But to turn attraction into a relationship is more difficult. Like for my wife and I, before we were married, I had my life and my plans, and she had her life and her plans. Then it was like we had to weave our two lives together."

'Indiana Jones' trilogy to be released in new DVD set for purchase

The "Indiana Jones" trilogy starring Harrison Ford will debut in digital format for the first time Nov. 4, announced Paramount Home Entertainment and Lucasfilm Ltd.

The three movies, directed by Steven Spielberg and produced by George Lucas, previously have been available only on VHS tapes, which have inferior picture and sound quality compared with DVD.

The new DVD set will include "Raiders of the Lost Ark" (1981), "Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom" (1984) and 1989's "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade," it was announced Tuesday.

James Dean gallery moving from actor's hometown

The curator of a gallery of James Dean memorabilia plans to move the display from the film star's hometown.

The new location in Gas City, Ind., is less than 10 miles north of Dean's hometown of Fairmount, Ind., but owner David Loehr said he hopes its proximity to the interstate will attract visitors.

"I think by moving to this new location, it could become one of the most popular tourist attractions in the state," Loehr said.

Steelworkers join protest against 'The Real Beverly Hills'

The United Steelworkers of America has joined the protest against CBS' plans for the reality TV series "The Real Beverly Hills."

"Poverty and a lack of education may be a joke to those who select television programming, but they are not to the millions of working poor in this country who strive to live their lives with dignity and pride," the United Steelworkers' president, Leo W. Gerard, wrote to CBS parent Viacom Inc.

U.S. official travels to encourage lifting U.N. sanctions

By Barry Schweid
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Bush administration is preparing to ask the United Nations on Friday or Monday to lift U.N. sanctions against Iraq and sent a senior State Department official to Moscow and Berlin to rally support.

As Kim Holmes, the assistant secretary for international affairs, flew to Moscow, a U.S. official told The Associated Press the United States would make its move in New York Friday or Monday.

Holmes' three-day trip coincides with reports that Germany and France have offered to help the United States win prompt adoption of the resolution.

French Ambassador Jean-David Levitte said in an interview that "we want to find the best possible solutions in the interest of the Iraqi people."

Levitte said that had France's proposal 10 days ago to suspend the sanctions been approved, there would be no sanctions now on Iraq or its people.

"We are now waiting to see the draft resolution, and we will discuss all the issues," he said.

In the meantime, Levitte said, a program that permitted Iraq to sell oil and use the revenues to buy food and medicine should be extended.

A senior U.S. diplomat told reporters this week that Russia continues to insist on certification that all weapons of mass destruction were removed from Iraq before agreeing to lift sanctions.

State Department spokesman Richard Boucher, in announcing Holmes' trip, said a prompt lifting of the sanctions was a key goal of the Bush administration in transforming Iraq from rule by Saddam Hussein.

Defining a "vital role" for the United Nations was another U.S. goal listed by Boucher. Secretary of State Colin Powell was expected to discuss the U.N. role Wednesday in New York with Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

As part of the drive to lift sanctions, Powell took up the issue Wednesday in Washington with Mexican Foreign Minister Luis Ernesto Derbez.

A State Department spokesman said they had focused on working constructively together in support of the Iraqi people.

Germany's national security adviser, Bernd Muetzelburg, met Monday with Condoleezza Rice, assistant for national security to President Bush, on sanctions.

German Ambassador Wolfgang Ischinger then told reporters that Germany would not stand in the way of a pragmatic resolution of the sanctions issue.

Another official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Germany was not insisting on "strict linkage" between the removal of all weapons of mass destruction and lifting the sanctions.

But the official said the German government had not reviewed the resolution's proposed text.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer said Wednesday that Germany was interested in working closely with the United States.

"We want to listen to them and hear their thoughts," Fleischer said.

On another front, Boucher said Deputy Secretary of State Richard Armitage will hold talks on Iraq sanctions during his current visit to Pakistan.

JAWS OF LIFE

Jason Bingham and Andrew Couchman, both volunteer firefighters and EMTs for the Blue Township Fire Department, use "Jaws" to tear apart a car during an extrication exercise. "I do this for the love of the people and wanting to save lives. I like to make a difference where I can," Bingham said.

WHO dispatches team to Chinese province affected by SARS

By William Foreman
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING — World Health Organization experts were being sent to a crowded province in China, where SARS is spreading fast, while new research published Wednesday suggests the illness is much more deadly than other respiratory diseases.

As the global death toll from SARS approached 500, Russia considered imposing harsh restrictions along its border with China, where experts say the disease has yet to peak. Chinese officials arrested alleged Internet rumor mongers and revoked the licenses of doctors who refused to treat the infection.

In Washington, U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services Tommy Thompson said China and the United States would work closer on SARS, although a senior Chinese official was noncommittal about providing U.S. scientists with specimens from patients.

The U.S. government has authorized immigration and customs inspectors at U.S. airports to use force to detain passengers who appear to have SARS symptoms. The

New York Times reported Wednesday. None had been detained so far, it said.

New findings in The Lancet medical journal show that SARS is killing one in five of patients hospitalized with the virus in hard-hit Hong Kong, including 55 percent of infected patients aged over 60.

In younger patients, the death rate could be as low as 6.8 percent, the study found.

"That's sadly still very high for a respiratory infection," said Roy Anderson, the epidemiologist at London's Imperial College who headed the study. "In other common respiratory infections it is much less than 1 percent in the vulnerable elderly."

The research, which also involved the University of Hong Kong and Hong Kong health authorities — is the first major study of SARS trends but was based only on data from Hong Kong, where at least 203 people have died.

Scientists differ over what the chances are for an average person anywhere dying from it. Worldwide, the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention puts the death rate at 6.6 percent. The World Health Organization says it ranges from 6 percent to 10 percent.

freedom to play whatever they want, it must be from the existing library, Wells said.

"They can't play any music we don't have in our library," he said. "The DJs can't bring in any music."

The station plays a lot of music everyone can identify with, said Adam Magette, senior in radio and television and DJ.

"Stuff like Nirvana, Pearl Jam, Soundgarden, Alice in Chains and Stone Temple Pilots — that's kind of the core for what we play," he said. "We try to play music that everybody can identify with and enjoy in some capacity."

The DJs also play music that stemmed from those bands, as well as different types of music, like metal and urban, Magette said.

"It's all derivative of that early '90s grunge movement," he said.

"We introduce new stuff, too. There's a lot of music other stations won't give air time to, but we do, which is the nice thing about a college radio station."

The station is not just music — there are talk shows where callers can call in and talk about opinions, sports shows and news, among others, Wells said.

"Our talk shows, in my opinion, are our best asset," he said. "They're really popular."

The funding is complicated, Wells said. The station can't sell persuasive advertising but can sell underwriting and mention sponsors on the air.

"We are funded entirely by student fees and the underwriting we sell," he said.

Selling underwriting is difficult because sponsors want more than the station can give them, Wells said.

"We can't mention percents. We can't mention 'on sale,' and we can't tell you to go and see them — they're the best," he said. "We can just say they are proud sponsors of 91.9."

The station has to be careful with what it plays and says on the air because it has such a diverse audience.

"We are governed more heavily by the FCC because we are a college station," he said. "You never know who's listening — we have a high school just down the street, and a lot of the students listen to our urban rock shows."

Being surrounded by good music is his favorite part of the job, Magette said.

"I can play pretty much whatever I want and speak to the entire university," he said.

Bush hopeful for Iraq unity

Bush, U.N. officials decide to send troops back to Iraq in hopes of stabilization

By Jennifer Loven
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — President Bush welcomed a raft of international supporters of the U.S.-led war in Iraq to the White House on Thursday as his administration prepared to engage in another U.N. showdown over its postwar goals for the country.

Bush had breakfast with one of his Iraq backers, lunch with another and spent the afternoon with half a dozen more.

Danish Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen, who

Presi-

George W. Bush

met with Bush in the morning, has agreed to send troops to help stabilize Iraq. He told Danish public radio afterward that his country wants to help move the latest debate — over lifting long-standing sanctions on Iraq — along in the United Nations.

Bush and Sheik Hamad bin Khalifa Al Thani, the emir of Qatar, talked about advancing Mideast peace as well as the future of Iraq.

U.S. war operations were based in Qatar; Bush offered effusive thanks.

"You made some promises to America, and you kept your promises," Bush said after their Oval Office session.

Later, the White House put on an East Room celebration for the foreign ministers of the seven eastern European nations preparing to join NATO. Six of them were partners in Bush's Iraq coalition.

With a new Iraq debate in the deeply divided United Nations only days away, White House press secretary Ari Fleischer termed the day "a real numerical reminder of how the world agreed with the United States."

The Bush administration is presenting the U.N. Security Council with a resolution on Friday to immediately lift international sanctions on Iraq and phase out the oil-for-food program, council diplomats said on condition of anonymity. The White House said it wants action before the United Nations' oil-for-food humanitarian program in Iraq expires at the beginning of next month.

Bush and other top members of his administration have struck conciliatory, hopeful tones.

"There's no reason that this current United Nations process should look anything like the last one," Fleischer said. "There is no reason for a dustup."

Secretary of State Colin Powell, following a meeting in New York with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan on Wednesday, said the U.S. effort would seek to bridge the Security Council rift opened by Bush's drive to force Iraqi President Saddam Hussein from power.

"Whatever happened in the past is in the past," Powell said.

And Bush, appearing Wednesday with Spanish Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar at the White House, declared diplomatic dispatches describe an international community that now wants "to work together for the good of the Iraqi people."

"We believe there is a mood to work together to achieve a resolution that will expedite the reconstruction of Iraq," Bush said at a conference.

Senate focuses on summer projects

Senators to take on SafeRide challenges, look at student wages

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Student Government won't be taking a break during summer vacation.

Student Body President John O'Hara said several things will be implemented before students return in the fall. There are other initiatives that will be researched this summer to be continued in the fall.

One program to be implemented in the fall is the USA Today Collegiate Readership Program.

O'Hara said senators will be working this summer to set up distribution locations and serve as contacts to make sure the program is ready in the fall.

Another new program in the fall will be SafeRide. The coordinator was hired, and O'Hara said they are still waiting to receive bids from taxi companies.

"We will be working on a marketing campaign this summer to make sure students know it is available and how to use it," O'Hara said.

O'Hara also said student wages will be increased in the fall. The minimum wage for student workers will increase from $5.15 and $5.75 per hour.

GTA, GA and GRA salaries will increase by 7.5 percent in the fall.

These wage increases are the result of tuition revenue. O'Hara said they identified these initiatives as being the most important, so they will be implemented in the fall.

More funding for diversity programs will be available to be allocated to student organizations by using tuition revenue, O'Hara said.

He said during the summer, Senate will work on developing a process by which organizations will go through to be eligible to receive part of the $100,000 available for diversity programming.

"We are going to be doing a lot of research on other issues this summer," O'Hara said. "It won't necessarily be changes in the fall, but steps to make changes in the future."

One of the areas being researched is something O'Hara said he needs students' help with.

He is asking that students who have had tests scheduled during Dead Week e-mail him or the Provost. O'Hara said he needs specific examples so that he can make those in charge aware that students are experiencing problems.

"People say the policy on Dead Week isn't working, but to make changes, I have to know about it," he said.

The smoking issue is also something senators will research during the summer months.

O'Hara said they will look into what other institutions do and if bans or partial bans work.

He said he also is beginning meetings with the associate deans next week to propose changes to enrollment practices and wait-list procedures.

He is proposing three changes to enrollment procedures.

The first is to not allow students to enroll in more than 18 credit hours per semester without special permission.

The second would not allow students to enroll in more than

Former student imprisoned for pornography violations

By Sarah Rice
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Vincent Gish went into custody at a federal prison Thursday and will spend the next 27 months locked in a cell. Two years ago, he was a freshman at K-State.

Gish connected to a file server in his Marlatt Hall room. There, he would download images and sometimes search for pornography. In that mix, he would get child porn. Gish would sort through the images and discard back onto the server the files he didn't want.

However, the Communication Decency Act of 1996 states "uses of any interactive computer service to display in a manner available to a person under 18 years of age ... as measured by contemporary community standards, sexual or excretory activities or organs, regardless of whether the user of such a service placed the call or initiated the communication."

Gish was sentenced to 27 months in a federal penitentiary and will be required to register as a sex offender for the rest of his life.

Gish's mother, Debbie, said she has a hard time understanding why her son was punished so harshly despite his ignorance that he was committing a crime.

"This is a moral issue, and it's wrong. But people aren't aware. Are they aware they can go to prison for it? The law states you can't have it, period," she said.

"He was concerned about getting kicked out of the dormitory and losing his Internet. That was his major concern. He certainly never thought about going to prison ever."

Debbie Gish worries about her son finding a job when he is free to society again and has to register along with pedophiles.

"It was stupid, but 18-year-olds make mistakes," she said. "I don't know anybody who would want to be held accountable for everything they do when they are

CAMPUS CONNECTION

Digital environment influences society in multimedia news-gathering techniques

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Internet updates, cellular-phone news briefs and live color radar. Can television and newspapers survive among all the other news-gathering devices available?

Campus Connection

Issues that affect K-State also affect other campuses around the nation. Campus connection investigates one issue of importance.

with the digitalization of society, Tom Grimes, professor of journalism, said.

"We no longer live in an analog world," he said. "We live in an Internet environment. The consequence of that is that television can't compete in an unlimited digital environment."

Grimes said some scholars are predicting the local evening news shows will be extinct within the next three to five years because digital media will allow users to choose what news they want, and it will be transmitted to them immediately.

Dustin Wallace, sales representative at Sprint, said the company has offered a similar service since August 2001.

Users can register to receive horoscopes, sports scores, movie times or news updates on their cell phone screens.

"It all depends on the customer," Wallace said. "It's for anybody that wants to read news on the go or check something out real quick."

Despite the rapid progression of digital technology, Grimes said enterprising executives with lots of money invested in analog television stations could find ways for their stations to survive.

Many people in America today rely on the Internet and other means of multimedia to obtain news.

One disadvantage of the digital news media, Grimes said, is that their local news is lacking information. Newspaper and TV stations set up bureaus and send reporters to cover many local events, but much of the digital news is not personalized, he said.

TV could prove to be as durable a medium as books and movies, Grimes said. Viewers may enjoy TV at times because it is not interactive, so the viewer doesn't have to put forth effort to get information, as one would from the Internet.

Even if analog technologies find a way to survive, Grimes said, the digital media are here to stay.

"There are a lot of smart people that own television stations who have a lot of money invested in them," Grimes said.

"They may figure out a way to get this old, creaky medium, you might be able to find a way to make it survive in a digital environment."

Multimedia is option for news seekers

By Dustin Vissering
THE DAILY AZTEC (SAN DIEGO STATE U.)

SAN DIEGO - There are now more ways than ever for students to get information, thanks to new alternatives to traditional media sources.

The Internet, cell phones and even non-news cable channels such as MTV are all offering news that fits the different tastes and schedules of students. For example, AT&T Wireless offers a free voice-activated news service to its customers, which allows them to get breaking news, movie listings and up-to-date sports and weather information.

Communication professor Tim Wulfmeyer said one of the most attractive components of these types of services is that people can use them any time they want and still get the information they need.

"People don't want to have to fit their schedules around when some network news program is going to be on," he said. "That is one of the main reasons alternative news sources like the Internet are enjoying more success these days."

For many students, the Internet is the best way to get the news quickly and conveniently.

Psychology sophomore Jamie Vasquez said going online is the best way to get the news without even having to turn on the television.

"I don't want to wait until the 10 o'clock news or watch MTV News to see what happened in the world," Vasquez said. "The nice thing about the Internet is I can be doing other things online and whenever I feel like I want to see news headlines, they are right in front of me and I don't have to stop what I'm doing."

Wulfmeyer said although some people condemn these alternatives as unreliable or simply not as good as newspapers or television news, the new media forms are still feeling their way out and trying to find what works.

"I think the more interactive and the more engaging news is, the better," he said. "The more news options that are given to people, the more people will be in tune with each other about what is happening in the world."

Liberal studies junior Jackie Greer said she relies on a number of sources to get her news.

"When I'm at work, I'll call up the news service on my cell phone to see what's going on during the day," she said.

Greer said she does not prefer one source of news over the other, just as long as she gets it from more than one.

"I don't think you can always trust only the Internet or just what you see on TV," she said. "I want to make sure that I get a true perspective on the events that are happening in the news."

Wulfmeyer said content should still be the main concern of the news consumer and the service providing it.

"People learn in different ways, and we shouldn't limit them to either traditional media such as newspapers or TV news, or the new high-tech forms of media like cell phones and the Internet," he said. "Eventually, all these new media forms will mature and will be given more respect."

Student appreciation night free for students

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Students hoping for a study break will have plenty of opportunities to unwind tonight at the Union Program Council's Student Appreciation Night.

Student film contest winners will begin the night with showings at 6:30 p.m. in Forum Hall. Comedian Jeffrey Ross will then take the stage at 9 p.m., followed by a 10 p.m., big-screen showing of "Old School" at the Union Plaza. Students also can play a game of Rock It! Bowl beginning at 10 p.m. in the Union's recreation area or make ice cream sundaes at 11:30 p.m. in the Union Food Court.

UPC President Matt Pruett said this is the first time UPC has sponsored the free event.

"We really just wanted to have a last hurrah for the year and thank people for supporting our programs," Pruett, senior in graphic design, said. "It will be a really good time."

Dana Watts, UPC adviser, said the event is a good way for students to de-stress after a week of hectic class schedules and last-minute homework assignments.

signments. She said the event corresponds to UPC's philosophy of educating and entertaining students.

"We help provide a balance between class work and jobs," she said. "We're kind of the entertainment arm of the whole student experience."

Watts said the event will give students an opportunity to watch a seasoned comedian. She said Ross has appeared on "The Tonight Show with Jay Leno," "The Late Show with David Letterman," "Politically Incorrect with Bill Maher" and "The Man Show."

"This is an opportunity for students to get out and enjoy some free entertainment, some free food and see things they might not see otherwise," she said. "We don't usually do something quite this big at the end of the semester, but this year, it just fit into our budget."

UPC Vice President Natalie Gervais said she hopes for a big turnout.

"This is just saying 'thank you for all you've done.' Plus, it's a nice break from studying," she said. "It gives students a chance to relax and save some money by getting free stuff."

Manhattan feels benefits of weekend graduation guests

Businesses see profits from parents, families

By Jessica Pitts
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

When more than 2,500 students walk across the stage May 17, their parents, friends and family will be there to watch.

And those guests translate into big business for the Manhattan community.

At the Fairfield Inn, 300 Colorado Street, people started calling to reserve a room for May 17 as early as June 2000, Sales Manager John Radliff said.

"We have been booked for quite some time," Radliff said. "It is a big day for us."

The hotel is also housing teams from the NCAA Regional Golf Tournament next weekend.

"It was a double hit," Radliff said. "It is going to keep us really busy, but we are looking forward to it."

Manhattan restaurants start to prepare for K-State's graduation months ahead of time. At Carlos O' Kelly's in Manhattan Town Center, the staff starts scheduling and training three to four months before the date, Lena Hommertzhim, hospitality manager, said.

"It takes us that long to prepare someone for the extra customers," she said. "We also make sure our staff knows they have to work the a.m. or p.m. shift because it is a super-busy day."

The restaurant hasn't had as many reservations, though, Hommertzhim said. Last year, it had about 10 reservations for graduation day, and this year the staff has taken only four calls.

"We are hoping it will pick up this next week," she said, "but if not, I am sure we will have lots of walk-ins."

Despite the hectic environment, Smith said it is a day her staff looks forward to.

"Business is great, and it is a lot of fun to see all the people," she said. "We have a great time."

Retail stores are not excluded from the extra business. At all three Varney's locations - Aggieville, K-State Student Union and Manhattan Town Center - Manager Jeff Levin said he expects a spike in sales.

"It is a big day," he said. "Families coming into the stores after or before graduation will definitely increase the traffic."

Levin said the customers are welcomed, and the staff looks forward to the day even with the busy schedules.

"We see such a variety of ages because of the extended family down for graduation," he said. "From little kids to great grandparents - each one of them has something to share. It is fun to talk to them."

TO THE POINT Safety should be considered in celebrations

Finals Week starts Monday, and alcohol use will be part of many students' celebration plans.

But before you drink, be sure to have some protective strategies in place to keep your night out from taking an unfortunate turn for the worse.

First, set a limit for your consumption to keep from drinking more than you plan.

Next, make sure you have a ride home from your Finals Week party place or bar before you begin your night on the town. A designated driver can be the difference between a night in bed and a night in jail.

Finally, if your celebration will start before your exams are finished, make sure to take steps to avoid nagging hangovers.

Eating a meal before drinking can help you stay full on food instead of alcohol. To combat the inevitable dehydration that accompanies alcohol consumption, make sure to drink plenty of water early and often, too.

In general, be responsible with alcohol consumption. While most students are careful when it comes to partying, the end of another semester isn't a pass to abandon precaution.

Most of all, remember to have fun and be safe during Finals Week.

To the point is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. This is the Collegian's official opinion.

RESIDENT LIFE

Community, roommate variety advantages of hall living

You wear shoes in the shower, have to walk miles to your car, live in a four-walled cinder block cell with a complete stranger, dine on some odd substance the dining center likes to call "food" and deal with other people's noise and drunkenness at all hours of the day.

Yes, I'm talking about the delightful residence halls — an experience I, surprisingly enough, wouldn't trade for the world. I'm a residence hall rat and proud of it. Let me give you a few reasons why.

Convenience

I'll admit it — I'm lazy. There is no way I am going to show up on campus a half hour early just to sit and wait on finding a parking spot.

As I'm walking to my 8:30 a.m. class, I can't help but feel an inkling of pity for those poor fools sitting in line at the end of the rows, hovering like vultures for the next available parking spot.

Sure, I may have to walk to llama lot to get my car sometimes, but I don't really drive it but once or twice a week, so a distant parking spot isn't a problem.

Roommates

I've had them all. The roommate from hell, the partier, the roommate who could care less, a rabbit and a roommate who has become a good friend.

The potluck process could do with some help, though. Sure, smoking and sleeping patterns are a major part of compatibility, but if the two people are completely different in background and mannerisms, it's a disaster waiting to happen.

Take me and my first roommate, freshman year. Big miss, Housing and Dining Services. We couldn't have been more different. She was a neat freak while I couldn't keep a desk straightened if my life depended on it.

My wall was plastered with posters while hers held a clock and laundry basket. We were as different as peas and carrots, and we didn't even mix.

Hall Governing Board programs

Sure, most times they're pretty lame, but every now and then, Hall Governing Board comes up with some really great ideas. Mocktails at Midnight is always a fun experience, as was the Tie Dye program and their Cram Bags at the end of term.

Ford Hall HGB comes up with some pretty cool ideas every now and then, and my time here has been made all the more fun because of it. Amber and Monica, you're cool.

The sense of community

I don't care what neighborhood you live in, I doubt your neighbors become your closest friends.

Nowhere but the dorms can you find people sticking their head in the door just to have a chat or be invited to random movie nights or a spontaneous "dance party" in your friends' room. I've made many friends throughout my residence hall experience, many of them amazing people.

Sure, I haven't had a decent night's sleep since I started college, but I've enjoyed every late night, every random Wal-Mart trip, the odd stranger stopping by just to chat and all the lifelong friends I've made along the way.

I've enjoyed every moment in the residence halls. I've made many friends, had many good times, and even though I've had to wear shoes in the shower for fear of catching some mutant strain of foot fungus, I wouldn't trade my time in the residence halls for anything. Not even free tuition.

Aimee is dropping off the face of the planet after finals week due to the likely explosion of her head after the Organic Chemistry final. You can reach her at aln5544@k-state.edu, but a reply is not likely.

CAMPUS FOURUM 395-4444

Congratulations to the K-State choirs for their spectacular performance at Carnegie Hall in New York City last week. Too bad the university didn't contribute one cent toward their expenses.

What do you call 17 tools in four apartments? I don't know, ask Chi Rho.

Thanks to the Collegian for not interviewing Diego Velasquez's fraternity brothers.

I love it when girls flash me at the CA desk.

How come Wal-Mart doesn't sell beer? I mean, they sell everything else.

It's not very nice of Parking Services to change regulations on us in mid-semester without any notification. That $35 ticket sucks.

Why would anyone want to block a pub crawl?

I feel like humping someone's leg.

I wanted to buy a drink at Rusty's last night, but I remembered I lent my last $20 to a woman with a wheel lock.

Yeah, that $20 was for the sex.

Marysville: where the men are men and the sheep are scared.

So I was at the bar last night and I met this girl named Boner. I just sat there and thought to myself, "Why?"

Oh yeah, and the next morning it occurred to me that Boner had bat wings.

Could it be no one likes Nemaha County since they kick everybody's butt in intramural softball every year?

Attempting to shut down file-share networks futile

A blow for freedom was struck last week, not by the forces in Iraq, but by the gavel of a federal judge.

(I know that was a cheesy lead, but I have a running bet to see how many consecutive weeks I can work Iraq into my columns.)

Anyhow, said judge struck down a lawsuit brought against Grokster and Morpheus, two file-sharing services, by the Recording Industry Association of America and the Motion Picture Association of America.

Or, as they are collectively known to all us little pirates, the Evil Empire.

Actually, I don't like the term "piracy." It has such negative connotations. I prefer "liberated distribution."

So, yeah, I hardly need to tell most of you about the direct benefits of peer-to-peer file swapping (especially you guys in Marlatt Hall). Simply put, it is the greatest development in the history of the arts.

But rather than embrace the New World Order, the record labels have chosen to shun it like a diseased child.

The poetic justice is that all their efforts to stop it have, in many cases, backfired and actually encouraged file sharing to flourish.

It's really appropriate because these companies are using their contracts to coerce artists into condemning file sharing, when musicians should be celebrating the phenomenon.

They aren't personally hurt. Revelations about CD price fixing have also revealed that artists make little more than a dollar off every overpriced CD.

The bulk of musician income comes from touring. So, following logic, increased exposure due to file sharing will probably result in ever more ticket sales.

Unfortunately, most artists signed draconian contracts before they made it big, leaving them handicapped from speaking out now.

That leaves opinionated punks like me to pick up the slack.

The best part has to be when industry executives like Jay Berman, IFPI chairman and CEO, prattle about "consumers who get less diversity and less choice" and tout their few victories against file-sharing services as victories for us.

How on earth can we have better choice when we are limited to the few packaged, no-talent hacks they throw in front of us?

Through file sharing, I can discover countless new independent bands, many of which never will be signed but blow most professionals out of the water just playing out of their garage.

Or how about those poor "record producers forced to reduce their artist rosters because it is impossible to compete against theft?"

Blessed are the artists cut free, I say, able to manage their own affairs and keep all their profits instead of paying corrupt managers to live decadent lifestyles.

I feel no pity for the fascist execs, especially now that they're planning to do patently illegal things to crack down on semi-legal activity.

These measures include Trojan horse programs that can damage your computer or screw up your Internet connection.

This is outrageous, especially when every objective mind in the computer field realizes this can't be stopped and laws to limit it can't be enforced.

Here's the good news: The industry is confused and reeling. They're starting to realize the futility of their crusade of greed, and they're panicking.

That Grokster lawsuit has set off even more alarm bells in the offices of the major labels. Grokster actually turned a profit because of it, mainly due to the new publicity and the subsequent increase to over 10 million users.

Wayne Rosso, Grokster president, said, "Every time they attack file-sharing software in any way, users rush to download the program just to see what's going on and become hooked. As a result, we prosper and revenues grow." This is like a jubilant death knell. I can hear the great powers like BMG and Viacom shaking now.

So, continue, you Kazaa users and you Blubster surfers. Continue to download your music files. Just make sure you also grab some concert tickets every so often, because even artists have to eat.

Andrew has been targeted for death by the CIA, the RIAA, HAMAS, and numerous other infamous acronyms. You can e-mail him at lawson@k-state.edu, if he ever stops running.

Students drink with responsibility

Professor conducts study examining alcohol's effects on students

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Most students take precautions when they drink, said Stephen Benton, professor of counseling and educational psychology.

"Basically, we found that protective strategies students use are related to the frequency they experience consequences of drinking," he said. "Those students who take precautions are less likely to experience academic difficulty or engage in property damage or other criminal behavior."

Benton's findings are a result of his new study of more than 5,800 students from four Midwestern universities. The study was discussed in his paper, "College Student Protective Strategies and Drinking Consequences."

"The study investigated only those college students who drink," he said. "We removed the students who don't drink."

The students were given an anonymous survey of about 30 questions.

"We sampled students in their regular classroom environment. We picked classes that enabled us to get a representative sample by gender and year in school," he said. "However, one limitation of that study was that we only got the students who go to class."

Benton said the study focused on drinking in general — not on one particular alcoholic beverage.

The questions were designed to find the number of drinks students have when partying, the frequency with which students fail academically as a result of drinking, how often students ride with someone who has been drinking and how many times students have been in trouble with authorities.

"We were also kind of interested in whether engaging in protective strategies was effective or not," Benton said.

Protective steps might include securing a designated driver, drinking with friends and drinking on a full stomach, he said.

"It is always important to use the protective strategies," he said, "but the best predictor if you're going to act in poor judgment is the number of drinks you have had."

Benton said that, on average, women have four drinks when they party, and men have eight.

"If the numbers exceed that for men, the strategies are not as effective. Eight gets you to the point that you're likely to get into trouble," he said. "The best thing men can do is drink less."

Stephanie Hoff, sophomore in agricultural journalism, said she thinks a lot of men act carefree — not violent — when they are drunk.

Senate unanimously votes 7 nations to join NATO

By Ken Guggenheim
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Senate voted unanimously Thursday to support adding seven eastern European nations to NATO, hailing the shift of former communist states into free-market democracies allied with the United States and Western Europe.

"This is historic for these seven countries, vital in continuing to strengthen the North Atlantic alliance and central to U.S. security and relationships in the world," said Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard Lugar, R-Ind.

If approved by all 19 NATO member states, Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia would be added to the alliance. Sixteen of the current members have not yet ratified the expansion.

Lugar said he hoped the Senate vote "might encourage other countries to proceed" with ratification.

Foreign ministers of the seven nations were in the Senate gallery to witness the 96-0 vote, well over the two-thirds vote needed for ratification. They were to meet later with President Bush.

Bulgarian Foreign Minister Solomon Pasi, speaking on Bulgarian radio from Washington, said "every Bulgarian has the good right to feel not only more secure, but also to be more proud" because of the vote. "We, Bulgarians, deserve it," Pasi added.

No House vote is needed on the expansion.

Noting the vote was taking place on the 58th anniversary of the allied victory in Europe in World War II, Senate Democratic Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota described the expansion as another step toward "the creation of a Europe that is whole, that is free."

"This is the beginning of a partnership that will produce greater world stability, greater international involvement in world affairs and a partnership with countries that will increasingly become valuable partners and allies of the United States," he said.

The unanimous vote contrasted with the heated debate that surrounded the last round of expansion five years ago, when the Senate voted 80-19 to add the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland. It also comes at a time when some senators question NATO's future because of the dispute within the alliance over the Iraq war.

It was also the second time in two months that the Senate unanimously endorsed an international treaty dealing with issues that had once been contentious. In March, it approved an agreement calling for a reduction in U.S. and Russian nuclear arsenals.

Bush administration officials have cited the difficulty of winning congressional votes as potential obstacles on some major foreign policy issues, such as nuclear talks with North Korea and immigration talks with Mexico.

"I hope that we have a very affirmative message today that our committee is effective and thorough," Lugar, who shepherded the agreements through the Senate, said.

In debate Wednesday, senators said the new members would boost NATO's forces by about 200,000 troops and add new bases that could be used for missions worldwide.

Games always timeless

BEN FEHR

It was inevitable. At family get-togethers, there was going to be a battle. Whenever we got a chance, my brother Michael, a couple years older than me, and my cousins Brian and Jordan, both younger, would join me for a game of whatever we were playing.

We played football and basketball quite a bit, wrestled a good amount of the time and even threw in some baseball — only we usually used a tennis ball so you could get people out by hitting them in the face.

I could lie to you and my grandmother and say these competitions were friendly. But I've never lied to Grandma, and why dance? Sure, we would laugh and slap each other on the back every once in a while.

But if we were playing, say, basketball, and Jordan got in my way, I was taking him out. With an elbow or whatever. (Jordan was by far the smallest of the four growing up. He's now the tallest of the bunch.)

We didn't just play for ourselves. We were playing for conference pride, that conference being the families on my father's side. We were playing to establish supremacy.

And don't assume Michael and I had an unfair advantage because we were older.

It kind of evened out. See, my brother has always been a bit of a faller.

I've seen him run into things you wouldn't even dream people could run into. Cars, people, shopping carts, trees, dogs — you name it, my brother has met it. And then he has either stumbled or fallen over it.

Rain delays women's golf team

1st round of NCAA regional postponed

By Tom Fontana
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

There are an abundance of things you can do during a rain delay.

Baseball players play cards, watch television or sleep. But for golfers, the day can be even more frustrating when you come to the course with the mindset you're going to get in 18 holes.

That's what happened to the women's golf team Thursday, as the first round of the NCAA Central Regional in Lincoln, Neb., was postponed due to rain.

"It's not the first time," Coach Kristi Knight said. "We didn't find out until noon today, so it's just kind of wait and see."

The 20-team field will play 36 holes Friday, something Knight said could make the tournament more familiar.

"The girls will be ready to go tomorrow," she said. "It almost makes it like a regular season tournament. Every regular season event we played 36 holes the first day, so it kind of makes it like any other event."

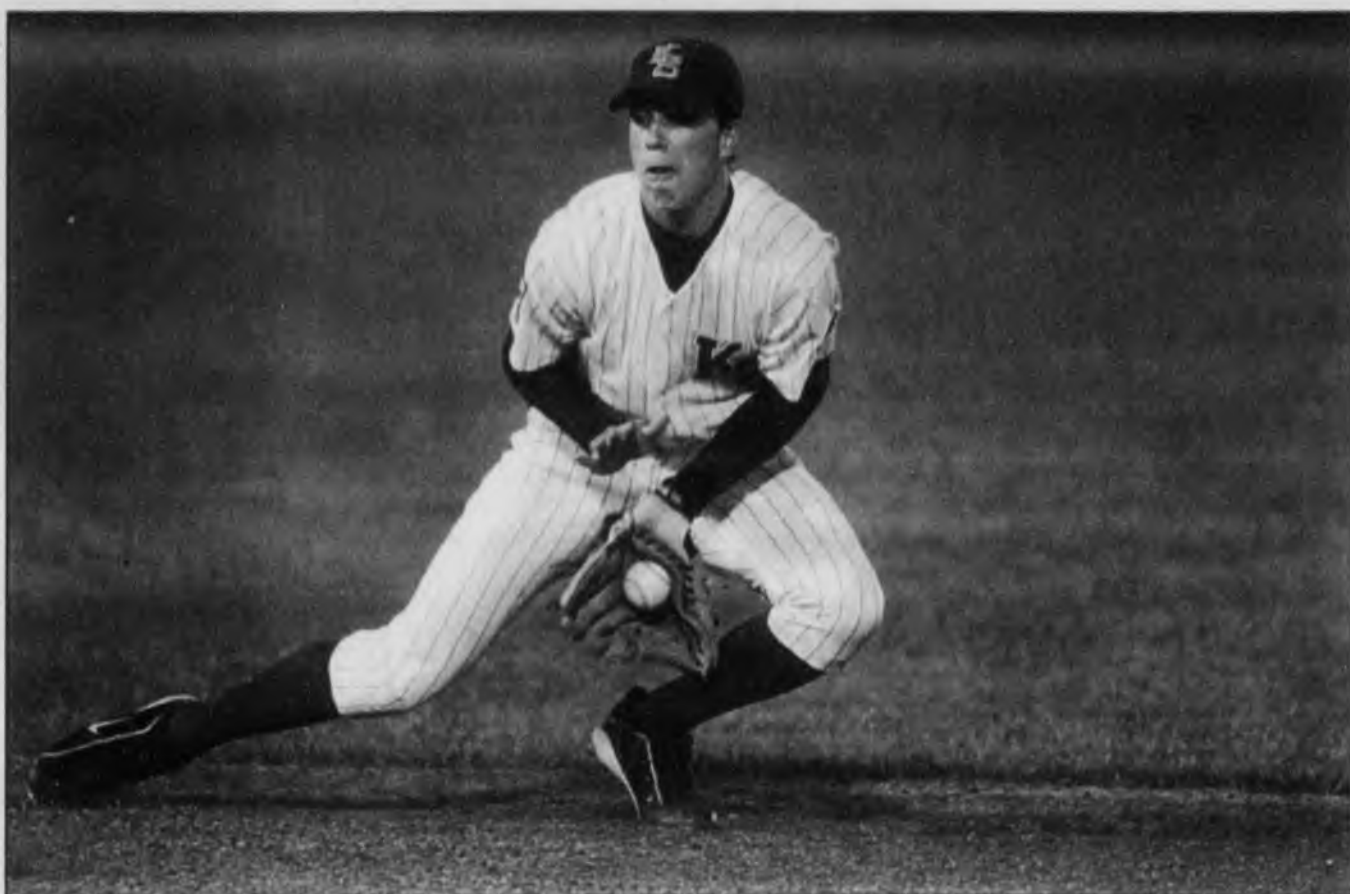

"We, this year, have done fairly well on 36-hole days," Knight said. "There's been a couple of events where we've struggled, but for the most part, we've played well on a 36-hole day."

Wildcats set for season's final home series

By David Skretta
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Call it the light at the end of the tunnel. Call it playing for your coach, who has just six games remaining at K-State.

Call it what you will, but K-State (12-34, 2-19) found something Tuesday night in a 2-0 loss to Wichita State.

What they found, Coach Mike Clark said was focus.

"I thought the kids played great," he said, "and are really focused right now on finishing this season on a good note."

Finishing on a good note means starting a four-game homestand, three of which come against perennial power Oklahoma (19-25, 7-14) this weekend. The series begins at 7 tonight at Tointon Family Stadium, with matinees at 2 p.m. Saturday and at 1 p.m. Sunday.

K-State pitching woes had become the norm prior to Tuesday, allowing more than eight runs in eight of nine losses. Yet Wildcat pitching sparkled against WSU, with senior Kevin Melcher giving up just one earned run in eight innings.

"Melcher set the example for what we're supposed to do," junior pitcher Jim Ripley said. "He kept the pitch count low and let the defense work. That's how you have to pitch in Big 12 games."

Solid pitching was spoiled by a lack of runs, however. The Wildcats' hitting slump continued as they belted out seven hits against the Shockers but left nine runners stranded.

"We didn't get the hits when we needed them," senior Tim Doty said. "We need to have good at-bats every time up there. Hopefully, we can get those key hits when people get on."

The Wildcats will undoubtedly need to score against Oklahoma. The Sooners are coming off a three-game sweep of Texas Tech.

Oklahoma pitching allowed just six runs during the series, led by junior Mark Roberts. He allowed one run on six hits in seven innings of work on May 2 against Tech, striking out seven.

"Roberts is one of the top pitchers in the conference right now," Clark said. "But they've also got a very talented ball club offensively. They play well and play hard."

Oklahoma is led offensively by second baseman Eddie Cornejo, last week's co-Big 12 Player of the Week. Cornejo, hitting .391 with 38 RBI, leads the Sooners in nearly every offensive category.

Cornejo has been the bright spot in a struggling season, however. After upsetting then-No. 1 Arizona State on March 14, Oklahoma dropped 10 in a row. Wins over Wichita State and Texas

A&M were followed by eight more losses.

But the Cats aren't taking the Sooners lightly, despite their early-season struggles, Doty said.

"We don't look at past records. You just need to go out and play for the day and give it everything you've got," he said.

K-State's focus may be even sharper because Oklahoma has righted the ship in the season's waning weeks.

"I think everybody was shocked at how they started Big 12 play," Clark said. "Unfortunately for us, they kind of got their wind about them. They're playing the best ball of their season right now."

Oklahoma has won five of its last six, taking two from No. 20 Oklahoma State. The Sooners' lone loss during that stretch was once again to Arizona State.

"It seems like they've turned it around," junior Zack Saunders said. "They're on a roll right now, and we need to put it to a halt — kind of wreck their party."

Probable starting pitchers

K-State vs. Oklahoma
■ Brett Bagley (1-2, 6.39 ERA) vs. Mark Roberts (5-4, 4.39 ERA)
■ Jim Ripley (3-6, 6.16 ERA) vs. Casey Brown (3-1, 4.78 ERA)
■ Kevin Melcher (0-6, 8.12 ERA) vs. Buddy Blair (3-6, 5.80 ERA)

Wildcats switch plans to avoid stormy Nebraska weather

By Joel Reichenberger
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Manhattan residents awoke to a 5:30 a.m. tornado siren Thursday, but for Coach Cliff Rovelto, it was just another reminder of the week-end to come.

A gloomy weekend weather forecast has driven Rovelto to try and opt out of a scheduled Nebraska meet and instead participate in a rescheduled Emporia State event.

K-State planned to have athletes attending both meets, originally scheduled to take place on Saturday. But aware of the weather, Emporia State bumped their meet up to today.

Rovelto didn't want to waste a trip to Nebraska for a meet that would likely be canceled, and instead hopes to have all of his athletes at Emporia.

"The weather's supposed to be really bad there, so we're trying to see if we can get our other kids in that Emporia meet," Rovelto said. "We don't know if the Nebraska one will come off or not."

The number of athletes affected by the change will be minimal, though.

This weekend's competitions will be the last before the Big 12 Championships, thus many regular top performers will have a stormy weekend to rest.

Rovelto said his throwers, jumpers and sprinters all will compete, but that is only about 30 athletes. For the rest, it is more important to save their strength and not be worn out come next week-end's contest.

"For throwers, you aren't going to wear yourself out," Rovelto said. "At this point, competition is probably more valuable than practice anyways."

K-State has entered the final regular season track meet the last two years determined to sharpen claws and win the Big 12 Championship. The women's team has been successful doing that, winning the conference back to back in 2001 and 2002.

But facing an increasingly difficult conference, Coach Cliff Rovelto said that this year he'd be happy with tough performances.

"We know we don't have the ammunition to win this year," he said. "Texas has an unbelievable team. They are going to win by a lot. Then Nebraska has a really good team, and they should get second."

K-State and Baylor are likely to slug it out for third, and anything below fourth, Rovelto said, would be a disappointment.

While there are many similarities between this year's team and the consecutive conference championship teams, it just doesn't all add up for a Wildcat victory in 2003, he said.

When the Cats travel to Austin, Texas, the focus will be on a solid team performance and overachieving individuals as well.

"I don't get caught up in where people place or where a team places as much as our performing well," Rovelto said. "We could have an individual win an event, but not perform that wonderfully but have someone else finish fourth or fifth and have the performance of their life."

"That's what I'm caught up in. That's what I want to see. In my mind, that's just as great."

1-MINUTE DRILL

The Associated Press

NBA | League names All-Defensive team
Detroit's Ben Wallace and San Antonio's Tim Duncan led the NBA All-Defensive team announced Thursday.

Wallace, the two-time NBA Defensive Player of the Year, got 27 first-place votes and 55 points to top the voting. He led the NBA in rebounding (15.4) and finished second in blocks (3.14).

Two-time league MVP Duncan received 44 points, earning a spot on the team for the fifth consecutive season. He ranked third in the league in rebounding (12.9) and blocks (2.93).

Also on the first team were Minnesota's Kevin Garnett (47 points), Sacramento's Doug Christie (38) and the Lakers' Kobe Bryant (35). Bryant and Garnett also made the All-NBA first team.

College basketball | Michigan's ban

Michigan's basketball team was barred from the next postseason by the NCAA on Thursday for rules violations stemming from the Fab Five era.

The team also will lose one of its 13 scholarships a year for four years, beginning in 2004-05, and was put on probation until November 2006.

Michigan held itself out of NCAA tournament play last season, and the NCAA infractions committee called the university's self-imposed penalties "meaningful" but not enough.

The case stems from an investigation involving now-deceased Michigan booster Ed Martin and whether he paid players, including current Sacramento Kings star Chris Webber.

Horse racing | Empire Maker to pass

Kentucky Derby runner-up Empire Maker will skip the Preakness next week and return for the Belmont Stakes on June 7.

After several days of hedging, trainer Bobby Frankel said owner Juddmonte Farms made the final call to keep the beaten Derby favorite out of the second leg of the Triple Crown.

"They don't want to run him back in two weeks," Frankel said Thursday from Hollywood Park. "And that makes sense. It's a long year, and we've still got the Belmont and the Travers."

High school | Olathe North's Weir to Texas

Olathe North football coach Gene Weir is resigning to become head coach and athletic director at a Texas high school.

Weir, 54, will coach Richland High School in North Richland Hills, in suburban Fort Worth.

Weir has a 188-36 record in 22 seasons at Olathe North, including six Class 6A state titles in the past seven years.

His teams have won three straight 6A championships, 38 consecutive games and 97 of their last 103.

In 2002, Weir led Olathe North to a 13-0 record and a 41-12 win over Dealey in the state title game after losing four Division I players from the 2001 championship team.

College football | Shula in at Alabama?

Mike Shula was excused from the Miami Dolphins' practice Thursday, amid reports he will become the new head coach at Alabama.

The Birmingham News, ESPN Radio and the Miami Herald are reporting that Alabama has settled on the former Crimson Tide quarterback and current Dolphins assistant as its new head coach and that an announcement could come as early as Thursday.

Calls to Shula's home went unanswered Thursday morning, and athletic director Mal Moore did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

NASCAR | Driver shows improvement

Jerry Nadeau was upgraded to fair condition and moved out of the intensive care unit Thursday, six days after he was critically injured in a crash at Richmond International Raceway.

Nadeau sustained head, lung and rib injuries in an accident during practice last Friday when his car slammed driver's side first into the concrete wall at the track.

A team spokesman said Nadeau's vital signs are normal.

MLB | D.C. submits bid for Expos

The District of Columbia proposed a $338 million package Thursday in an effort to persuade baseball owners to move the Montreal Expos to the nation's capital.

The plan includes $275 million for a new ballpark and $15 million to renovate RFK Stadium, where the team would play until a new stadium is ready.

"We believe we'll see far more revenue than necessary to weather any vagaries," said Steve Green with the District of Columbia Office of Planning and Economic Development.

Washington, Northern Virginia, and Portland, Ore., are seeking the Expos, who were bought by the other 29 teams before the 2002 season.

Ford Hall to add suites to building

Renovations to be completed by August 2004

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Residents of Ford Hall will be playing musical chairs next year — with their rooms.

One wing of the building will be closed for renovations during first semester, and residents will switch wings at semester break so the other wing can be renovated as well.

The building will be remodeled to include suites, which share one bathroom among two to four residents, said Derek Jackson, assistant director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services.

Both wings will be open to residents by August 2004, he said.

The changes will reduce the number of beds in Ford by about 160, Jackson said, but additional beds were added to the basements of Putnam, Marlatt and Goodnow halls to compensate.

The revenue generated from Ford Hall residents will remain consistent, Jackson said, despite the decrease in the number of residents.

Students will be required to pay more for the suites than for the regular residence hall rooms, he said. The price difference has not been determined.

Casey Dobbins, junior in animal sciences and pre-veterinary medicine, will be the multicultural assistant in Ford next year and said she supports the transition to suites in the building.

"Maybe while we're moving, it might seem like an inconvenience," she said. "But we'll have a chance to live in the brand new rooms."

Next year's Ford residents already have people lined up to help move their belongings when the first wing is completed, Dobbins said.

The decision to change the building to suites was based on residents' feedback, Jackson said.

"There has been an increased demand," he said. "People want more options."

There are no plans to renovate additional residence halls to include suites, Jackson said.

Dobbins commended Housing and Dining Services for listening to the students' concerns. She said many students wanted suites, and the university is providing them with what they want.

"The main thing is the residents are getting what they asked for," she said. "It's good that they're changing it to fit the residents' needs."

Dobbins said the renovations will prove to be a positive change for the university, saying the multiple options of living situations will offer something for everyone.

"In the long run," she said, "it will benefit residents' life."

Student choir members to sing in Vatican City

Plans to include chance to see pope, touring, sightseeing

By Stephani Edington
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

For Catholics, visiting the Vatican City may be a great honor. But the St. Isidore's Catholic Student Center choir members will not only visit the Vatican — they also will get the honor of singing there.

Father Keith Weber said this is a trip he has been wanting to take for a while.

"The choir director and I have talked about it before, and this year we decided to offer it," he said. "We worked with a travel company to put the tour together."

The trip will be May 19-29, and the group will have mass at most of the main cathedrals in Italy, Weber said.

Almost 40 people are going on the trip, including Weber and choir director Frank Schmeidler.

"Most of them are students," Schmeidler said. "We have some faculty who we call the permanent community going, too."

The choir will be touring and sightseeing but will focus on singing, Schmeidler said.

"We will be singing at a papal audience," he said. "We will also sing main mass at St. Peter's Basilica and perform a concert at St. John Lateran, the cathedral of the world."

The group will travel to many cities in Italy, Schmeidler said.

"We will spend five days in Rome, then go on to Assisi, Florence and Pisa and end up in Venice, performing at St. Mark's Cathedral."

open-option, said she is very excited about the trip.

"It will be really cool to see a major part of our faith, and to sing for the pope and see the Vatican and sing in all the cathedrals and basilicas," she said.

Clement said she got some help in paying for her trip.

"I got some help from St. Isidore's, some from my parish at home, and the rest was mine," she said.

Schmeidler said St. Isidore's was able to raise enough money to help everyone out.

"We've done enough fund raising to reduce the cost by about $500," he said. "That's about one-fourth of the cost."

Clement she never thought she would get the opportunity to be apart of such a trip.

"I'm so fortunate to be a part of it," she said. "We have a great group of people going with us, which will make the experience even better."

Clement looks forward to seeing the sites of Italy, she said.

"Besides seeing the pope, I am looking forward to seeing St. Peter's and the Leaning Tower of Pisa," she said.

Planning the trip has given choir attendance and membership a boost, Schmeidler said.

"It's really given them incentive," he said. "It's great to be able to see the universal church, and to be able to sing in it is a great opportunity."

The group is practicing hard, Clement said.

"Practices are getting really interesting," she said. "I'm hoping we're ready. I'm not quite sure we are right now, but I know we will be."

Alleged Iranian weapons program spurs concerns from U.S.

By George Jahn
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

VIENNA, Austria — Concerned that Iran may be running a nuclear weapons program, the United States is pushing for U.N. action against Tehran, diplomats said Thursday.

Washington is specifically seeking a declaration from the board of the International Atomic Energy Agency that Iran has violated the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which it has signed, according to diplomats familiar with the agency.

The United States has accused Iran of secretly embarking on a program to enrich uranium at Natanz in southern Iran, which American officials fear could be used to make nuclear weapons.

The diplomats said U.S. requests for support have gone out to Russia, France, Britain, Germany and other members of the 35-nation board — the key decision-maker at the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency — ahead of its meeting next month.

The diplomats were confirming a report in Thursday's editions of The New York Times.

Britain, Washington's closest ally, suggested Thursday that it was receptive to the U.S. overtures.

"We share U.S. concerns about the scale and scope of the Iranian nuclear program," said a spokeswoman for Britain's Foreign Office in London, speaking on customary condition of anonymity. "We'll be listening carefully to the (IAEA) director-general's report at the next board meeting."

In Washington, President Bush told reporters: "I've always expressed my concerns that the Iranians may be developing a nuclear program. I have done so publicly. I have done so privately. I expressed those concerns to Vladimir Putin when I was in Russia."

Noting the IAEA was coming out with its report in June, Bush said, "We'll wait and see what it says."

A declaration, depending on its language, could restrict itself to expressing concern about a violation or increase pressure on Tehran to account for its activities by referring the issue to the Security Council.

That would further strain U.S.-Iranian relations, which took a turn for the worse last year after Bush labeled Tehran part of the "Axis of Evil" for its alleged support of terrorism.

More recently, Tehran has said it would not recognize any U.S.-installed government in Iraq. And Washington signed a truce with the People's Mujahedeen, which opposes the Tehran government, allowing it to keep its weapons although the Iraqi-based group is on the State Department's terrorist list.

Department spokesman Richard Boucher said the U.S. had made it clear that "we support a rigorous examination of Iran's nuclear activities."

MUTANT BLOCKBUSTER

Sequel doesn't promise much; plotline lacks sense at times

"X2: X-Men United" marks the beginning of summer as far as movies are concerned.

Not surprisingly, the sequel to 2000's "X-Men" is a huge, glitzy affair, rife with elaborate action scenes, well-choreographed fights and slick new mutants. The flashy blockbuster is a prime example of the movie fodder that is to come.

A note to those who have not seen the first "X-Men": the story makes sense without any extra background.

The audience meets one of the newest mutants within the first five minutes — a blue creature with an impish spiked tail who runs like a cheetah, fights like an angry tiger, and has the ability to disappear in a puff of blue smoke, only to reappear in a completely different part of the room. This guy sneaks into the White House, nearly succeeds in taking the president's life, then disappears.

But that isn't the last that will be seen of Nightcrawler.

The old good guys from the first flick are all back in the sequel: Professor Xavier (Patrick Stewart), Wolverine (Hugh Jackman), Storm (Halle Berry), Cyclops (James Marsden), Jean Grey (Famke Janssen) and Rogue (Anna Paquin).

Rather than pit good mutants against bad mutants, "X2" throws in an interesting twist; William Stryker, a former military scientist, is trying to rid the world of all mutants, and Professor Xavier's crew must team up with its former enemies, Magneto (Ian McKellen) and Mystique (Rebecca Romijn-Stamos), to stop Stryker.

This flick's star power alone is just about enough to warrant the $7 expenditure. The beautiful young actors provide eye candy, while the veterans lend credibility.

Anna Paquin, in particular, is a breath of fresh air: a talented young female star who doesn't look like a supermodel and isn't so young that she needs a guardian's signature.

The new characters display more awesome tricks than a band of magicians.

A scene in which federal agents invade Xavier's school for mutant children features a girl running through solid objects and a boy who can cover himself with bulletproof metal, to name only two.

The new bad mutant on the block is Death-strike, a beautiful woman with steel claws and lightning-fast healing abilities — sort of like a female version of Wolverine. Her one major fight scene is probably the best in the movie — with the exception of Nightcrawler's romp in the White House.

"X2" succeeds more than most movies of its type in regards to character development. Personal griefs and joys are addressed, but the emotional moments don't come off as tacky afterthoughts thrown in as a balance to the action.

The complicated plot actually makes sense, though at times it gets a little surreal. Unfortunately, director Brian Singer is dealing with several different lines of action at once, making it a challenge to maintain continuity.

The choppy nature of the film makes the two-plus hours drag at times. The X-Men franchise is being milked for all it's worth.

And to milk a franchise for all its worth, there must be room for another sequel. The screenwriters didn't leave out that possibility, so moviegoers probably haven't seen the last of the X-Men.

Writer plagued by an insecure inner voice as graduation calls his name

I never did start a band.

I never was in a K-State theater production.

I didn't paint enough while I was in college.

You know, I feel pudgy, too. I need to start jogging more. I need to find a good job. I need to succeed so I don't disappoint my friends and family. I need to figure out what success means to me. I should stop sleeping with so many girls and stop drinking so much and staying up so late and driving just about anywhere to see a band I like. I should grow up.

Grow up? I don't know about that one.

Remember when I was 15 and I wrote in my notebook about the nature of the word adult? That it was actually a modified combination of two words: "a dolt."

I should write a letter to myself to be opened in 10 years and see if I feel guilty when I open it. Will I feel like I let myself down? I'd probably be too scared to open it.

I'm going to miss K-State. I'll miss Manhattan, too. I don't know why people put it down. I love this place. I'll miss walking into the Collegian just about every day. The only place on campus where everyone knows my name. God, what the hell am I going to write on the ceiling anyway?

I'm 22 and about to graduate. Mom and Dad are just glad to see that alcohol didn't keep me from walking across the stage like it kept me from winning the spelling bee in third grade when I couldn't spell it.

And I might even have a real job lined up. The future looks good. Good and boring.

I don't wanna grow up. I love that song. You know, not many people know Tom Waits wrote it for the Ramones.

I want to be an eternally young Lostboy like Peter Pan. I don't want to get a 9-to-5 that comes along with a gut, a house payment, a future marriage and a kid along the way.

I want to rock 'n' roll all night and party every day.

But then again, that scene does get pretty tiring. I want to travel and learn more about the world before I get stuck in one spot. But I don't have any money. I need to figure out my true goals. What matters the most to me anyway?

Maybe I should just graduate and waste my educated mind delivering pizzas.

I've always wanted to deliver pizzas. Just for that slim chance of the porno-pizza fantasy. "Would you like a hot slab of sausage with that, ma'am?"

I need to figure things out. Does anyone else think like this before they graduate? I hope I'm not the only one. God, I sound insecure.

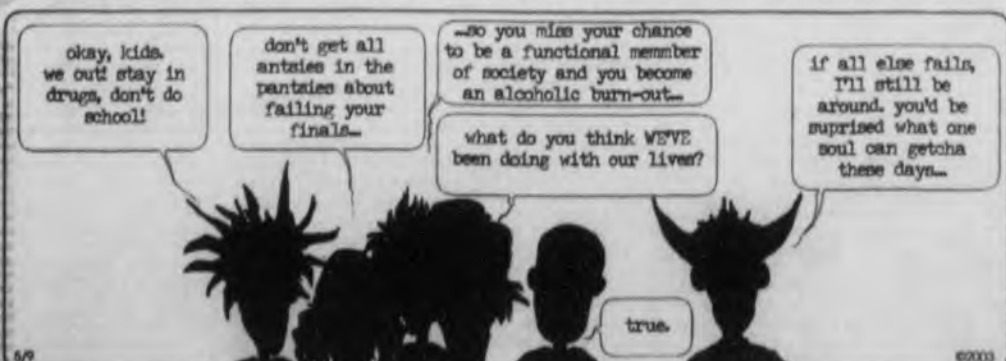

Stop it.

JJ Duncan will graduate Saturday, if he is sober. You can e-mail him at jjduncan_80@hotmail.com.

*Use Your Thinking Cap!

If you give a little thought to overhead power lines, certain facts quickly become evident. These lines are not insulated. So one touch will conduct electricity from the line to you. It can happen in an instant.

Electrical accidents usually happen when you're not even thinking about electricity. Like when you're moving a ladder, lifting a pole, raising a crane, moving or operating large equipment. You might be cleaning a gutter or installing an antenna; flying a kite or skimming your pool; even moving farm equipment across fields.

Never try to lift or move an overhead power line, even if it's down; and if an object should get caught on an overhead line, never try to remove it. Call Westar Energy at (800) 794-4780. We'll take care of it quickly and safely. Please be careful whenever you're near overhead lines. You just need to keep two things in mind: think twice, put safety first.

one section of the same course.

The third would prohibit students from enrolling in more than one class that meets at a specific time.

"It's all a matter of taking up more than one spot in a class or saving spots for friends," he said.

"Students need to be able to get into the classes they need."

The wait-list procedure, one of O'Hara's and Vice President Travis Stryker's platform issues, also will be addressed.

O'Hara said they are developing a task force committee to help identify what changes the current system needs.

"There should be a new system in two years, and we want to make sure it addresses all the problems we are experiencing right now," O'Hara said. "We also want to identify interim solutions."

Senate also will be present when tuition increases are proposed next week and then voted on by the Kansas Board of Regents in June.

"There are just a lot of things we will be working on," he said.

"And students will notice some changes in the fall."

COLUMN | Childhood, games with family should never be forgotten

I wasn't Mr. Perfect by any stretch of the imagination, either. I wasn't nearly as dashing in the 1980s as I am today.

I had abnormally short arms, my hair wouldn't lay down right, and I had an eye condition - no doubt compounded by a habit of staring directly at the sun. My nursing-student girlfriend tells me the condition I had was amblyopia.

To my family and me, however, the condition was known as "lazy left eye."

This led to my having to wear a gauze eye-patch three days out of the week over my right eye, of course, a tactic that forced me to use my stubborn left eye for navigation.

So, as you can imagine, I gave up quite a few backdoor cuts and touchdowns when my opponent got behind me to my left, or right when I was wearing the patch.

But my worst disadvantage was due to the glasses I wore. I know you've seen the kind of frames. Plastic. Thick plastic.

Either light gray or brown see-through. And I had tinted lenses that turned darker when exposed to sunlight.

You know, so I could look at the sun better.

You'll see the same kind of frames on the elderly. They were durable - but not durable enough.

My cousins still have a good laugh from time to time, trying to recall exactly how many times my glasses were destroyed in our childhood competitions. I would be standing there and, wham! - tennis ball in the face and goodbye left lenspiece.

Or, whack! - baseball-style basketball pass in the ear, goodbye earpiece. I remember at least three times when I caught a ball in the head and my glasses exploded, vaporized by a kickball or Brian's palm.

When this happened, I was out of the game until I scored a new pair of specs.

But my cousins were always so supportive, helping me pick up the pieces before I'd run back into the house in tears.

So nice, but I was surprised to learn later in my life that they'd make fun of me once I was out of sight.

It must have been hilarious to watch. But I'd be back. I'd get a new pair of glasses, and I was back on the field in no time.

My family was on top of the conference heap a number of times, often due solely to a personal victory.

And there were always more games to play.

I could relate this great story to some current topic or issue in the sports world, but for my last column, I wanted my readers to be able to have a little laugh at my expense and to say "what up" to my family, whom I love dearly.

Until next semester and Wildcat football, peace.

young.

"There's got to be some dividing line between criminals and a stupid mistake."

Most of all, Debbie Gish said she just wants other students to learn from her son's mistake.

"I would like this to not happen to some other young men or women because they just don't know," she said. "Nobody I knew had ever heard of this. Morally is one thing, but breaking the law - you didn't know."

Debbie Gish said the root of the problem lies in the nature of the technology age children grow up in.

"This is not an isolated event. There is a problem with our technology and these men and girls, too, not giving it a lot of thought."

"Kids need to know you can't allow that to get on your computer in any way. You are subject to some of your worst nightmares."

GOLF | Patience key virtue for teams waiting on stormy conditions

After learning there would be no golf match Thursday, Knight said the teams found something to do around a shopping center in Lincoln.

"They've got an outdoor-type shopping area that has stores and a movie theater," she said. "Three of the girls are at a movie, and the rest of us are wandering around."

"I think there's probably around 10 teams at this shopping area," Knight said. "Even though it's still nasty outside, you just try to keep yourself busy. It's about all you can do."

With a wet and muddy course waiting for the teams on Friday, Knight said players will have to come ready to play on an even more difficult course.

"You have to emphasize patience," she said. "The rules of officials intend to play the ball down. We're going to be dealing with mud on the ball, but so are the other 20 teams."

"It's going to make the course a little bit longer. It's going to be the same for everybody. We'll just kind of see who comes out the best."

Commencement ceremonies set; speakers reflect on time at K-State

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Cheering friends and family, camera flashes and pomp and circumstance will surround about 2,600 graduating students on May 10, 16 and 17.

The spring class of 2003 — K-State's 136th graduating class — will receive 2,100 bachelor's degrees, 310 master's degrees, 55 doctorates, 101 doctor of veterinary medicine (DVM) degrees and 80 associate degrees.

Lynsey Burnett, senior in airway science and professional pilot, will speak at the commencement for the College of Technology and Aviation in Salina — the university's first commencement ceremony.

Burnett, K-State-Salina's former student body president said she isn't nervous about addressing graduates in the Kansas Highway Patrol Training Center auditorium.

"I've spoken before at the December graduation, but this one will have more students with more family members," she said. "I have two really good friends graduating, so this speech might have more of a personal effect."

Commencement ceremonies in Manhattan will begin Friday, May 16 with the Graduate School and College of Veterinary Medicine, followed by the others on Saturday, May 17.

Al Cochran, Faculty Senate president and music professor, will begin graduation weekend at 8:30 a.m. Saturday. Cochran has just six minutes to speak at the College of Arts and Sciences ceremony.

"Since I only have six minutes, I have to choose my words very carefully," he said.

Cochran said it is an honor to speak at the graduation.

"I was very touched when the dean asked me to do it," he said. "I consider it a really high honor, and I'll certainly do my best to do a good job."

Cochran said although he normally attends graduation ceremonies, this year will be different.

"I'm looking forward to it — I think it will be a lot of fun," he said. "It will be interesting looking out over the crowd from the perspective of the platform because I've always looked out from the floor."

Kyle Nichols, senior in animal sciences and industry, said he will miss the K-State atmosphere, but it's time to move on.

"I'm not really excited to graduate, but I think that some people want to get out of here as fast as they can," he said. "I wish I could stick around another year or two, but I guess it's time to go face the real world."

Assistant deans in the College of Agriculture nominated Nichols to speak at the commencement ceremony. Nichols said student speakers are chosen based on leadership and involvement in the college.

"My part is kind of small, but basically, my topic is kind of the reflections part of the ceremony," he said. "It will be a time to look back and reflect on the events of the year."

Architecture students chose classmate Ken Gibson to speak at their commencement. Gibson, senior in landscape architecture, said he wants to keep his speech light-hearted.

"I'm excited to speak at the graduation. It will be a lot of fun," he said. "I don't get nervous, and we've had plenty of practice presenting projects. It's second nature to us now."

Gibson said although he will miss his friends, graduating will be a welcome change.

"I'm a little excited to get out in the real world, but then again, I'm a little upset that I won't be able to do the whole college life thing again," he said.

Although he will be busy making it in the real world and paying back student debt, Gibson hopes to keep in touch with classmates.

"It's sad to see everyone leave, but we'll all run into each other again," he said. "It will be interesting to see where everyone goes from here."

General information for graduates

■ Assembly order — You will assemble in alphabetical order within degree groups. Your college marshal will direct the formation of the processional march and will give you a name card to present to the commencement reader at the stage. Refer to your assembly place and time listed in Section I.
■ Personal items — There is no checking area. Leave all valuables (purses, wallets, cameras) at home, in the trunk of your car or with a trusted member of the audience.
■ Cancellation — If weather conditions make driving conditions hazardous around the Manhattan area, a cancellation notice will be provided to radio and TV stations across the state.

General information for guests

■ Ceremonies — All commencement ceremonies are open to the public. Seating will be limited if a college has a large number of graduates.
■ Venue hours — Lobby doors at McCain Auditorium open at 8 a.m. Friday and Saturday, with doors to the seating area opening one hour before each ceremony. Limited lobby seating is available. Lobby doors at Bramlage Coliseum open at 8 a.m. Friday, May 16 and 7:30 a.m. Saturday, May 17. Guests should enter the coliseum's north-west or northeast doors.

Counter-protesters will offer opposition to anti-gay picketers

Community group to stand against Phelps' message

By James Hurla
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Coalition for Community Action members want to ensure their message is heard. To accomplish this, they will be silent.

"A Date With Hate" is an annual demonstration at K-State's graduation designed as a counter-protest against Fred Phelps and Westboro Baptist Church's anti-gay protests.

The protests generally are outside the entrance to Bramlage Coliseum, said Becky McQuilliam, media relations officer for the coalition and junior in social work.

McQuilliam said she was not aware of any confrontations between the two sides, but there is a barrier between the opposing protesters.

Silence is an important aspect of the counter-protesters' message, McQuilliam said.

Instead of chanting or speaking, the coalition will stand silently with placards containing messages that portray love and acceptance, McQuilliam said.

Phelps and members of his Topeka church often hold upside-down American flags and signs with messages such as "God hates fags" and "Thank God for Sept. 11."

This is the third year for the Date with Hate, McQuilliam said.

"It's important, not just for K-State students, but for the entire community to say this is not acceptable," she said.

According to the Westboro Baptist Church Web site, the Protesting the protesters church's mission is to use the Bible to convince others that homosexuality is a "soul-damning, nation-destroying notion."

McQuilliam said she first became involved with the coalition because some of her classmates in the social work curriculum encouraged her to join.

This year's demonstration will be her second.

"I reached a point in my life when I decided it was time to take a stand," she said.

"I don't want to let others decide for me."

By holding signs and participating in the silent protest, McQuilliam said she and the other protesters will show passersby that they do not have to accept Phelps' message.

"People may think that's how Manhattan feels," she said.

"It's vital that we show them it is not our viewpoint."

Phelps and his anti-gay protesters practice demonstrations primarily in Topeka, but according to their Web site, the group will travel for protests at the graduations of University of Kansas Law School, Blue Valley North High School in Kansas City, Mo., and Free State High School in Lawrence.

The Date With Hate is practiced only once each year during K-State's graduation, McQuilliam said, because the counter-protest is difficult to plan.

"We're happy to have the opportunity to have our message heard," she said. "It's always exciting when you see someone take a stand against hate."

Alumni Association offers opportunities

Membership provides benefits, retail discounts

By Crystal Becker
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Many graduating seniors may be reluctant to leave K-State behind. With the help of the K-State Alumni Association, they won't have to.

Courtney Marshall, 1996 graduate and director of alumni communication and member services, said membership in the Alumni Association helps students maintain their link to K-State.

"I think recent graduates go off and find a job and may be in a new place that is totally unfamiliar," she said. "Having that connection and knowing what's going on at your alma mater brings out a sense of continuity and feeling that you can be proud of where you came from."

Some membership benefits include subscription to the K-Stater magazine, discounts at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, discounted child care at home football games, discounted rates at Colbert Hills Golf Course and access to libraries, the natatorium and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Marshall said graduates also can save money through the association's loan consolidation program. She said about 190 students have already signed up for the program.

"We have a loan consolidation program through NELNET," she said. "We've been working with them to help take advantage of low interest rates on student loan consolidations."

Marshall said temporary insurance is also available through the Alumni Association.

The short-term insurance, available through GradMed, provides comprehensive major medical coverage for new graduates and alumni, she said.

"A lot of times, recent graduates need short-term coverage," she said.

"There is usually a 60- to 180-day interim period that students aren't covered by parents' insurance and need coverage before their job starts. This is a really good way for you to maintain insurance based on age, gender and geographic area."

The Alumni Association also can be a helping hand for graduates without jobs, Marshall said.

"We work with Career and Employment Services and have a program through Drake Beam Morin, one of the world's leading providers of career management programs and services," she said. "We are trying to help people find jobs and continuing to try to help recent grads find jobs."

Marshall said graduates also can apply for the PowerCat Visa through the association, earning money for student recruitment, alumni programs and scholarships with each purchase.

"We do a lot of things that go unnoticed, like recruiting and efforts to help build up K-State," she said.

"This is just one way to join the 37,000-plus members and support the university."

Marshall said most students will graduate with automatic membership in the association.

"Seven of the nine colleges give students their first year of membership as a graduation gift," she said.

Marshall said the College of Arts and Sciences and the College of Architecture, Planning and Design do not give their graduates membership gifts.

However, separate departments often purchase membership, and lower rates are available for first-year graduates.

"There are different recent graduate rates," she said. "Any undergrad that graduates within five years has a one-year membership rate of $15, and regular one-year memberships after five years is just $30 per year."

Graduates can choose from single and joint memberships, one-year, three-year and lifetime membership fees.

Donna Relihan, 1949 graduate from Chapman, Kan., has been a lifetime member of the association for 54 years.

"We find it beneficial. I am proud to say I am a lifetime member," she said. "All four of our children are K-State grads, and both my husband and I went to K-State. We're pretty loyal K-Staters."

Members like Relihan have helped K-State maintain the highest percentage of members in the Big 12 region for the past five years.

Marshall said more than 28 percent of college graduates become Alumni Association members.

"The purpose of the Alumni Association is to maintain that link for life," she said. "We want to be that connection, whether you move to Kansas City or Minneapolis — we're that connection back to K-State."

Job search stressful, worthwhile experience

By JJ Duncan
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduation is just around the corner, and you get nervous every time your parents' number pops up on caller ID. Why? Because you know what they're going to ask.

"Have you found a job yet?" It's one of the scariest questions asked of a young graduate of the class of 2003. Especially since the economy has people second-guessing the decisions that might determine their entire careers.

But don't freak out. Collect yourself and get busy. Kristy Morgan, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said it isn't uncommon for students to find themselves at the end of the college road with no clear plan as to where to go next.

"We have students come in who have chosen not to deal with the job search until graduation, or it will sneak up on them," she said. "They probably need to work quickly and get a résumé together. They need to get serious about the job search because it's time to make that a priority."

Morgan said workshops are offered throughout the year for job searchers, but closer to graduation, the people at CES normally utilize one-on-one meetings to help students. The first step in that search is a strong résumé, and Morgan said students need to learn how to build a résumé that is tailor-made for the positions they want and the skills they have.

Morgan pointed out that many students leave off experience they might think is irrelevant, but it can matter to a potential employer.

"Employers see farm experience as hard work with long hours," she said. "It shows a work ethic. But most students think, 'Oh that's just what my family did.'"

"Many employers around here have done farm work and relate well to those students, so they like to see that."

Graduate school has become a more attractive option for some soon-to-be graduates with the downturn that has taken place in the economy during the past two years. Earning a master's degree while warding off those student loans for a few years until the economy gets back on its feet works for some, but Morgan said she doesn't recommend it very often to those who come to CES.

Searching for a job?

"There has been an increase in grad school enrollment this year, and there are fields where a student's abilities become better developed through graduate classes," she said.

"I might recommend it in some cases, but if the student doesn't want to go to grad school, it's probably not for them if they just want to defer student loans. There needs to be a further interest before I would recommend that option."

Internet job-search sites also have become a piece of the job hunting process. And while the sites, such as monster.com, provide useful information for researching jobs in which someone is interested, Morgan said to approach them with caution.

Above all else, Morgan said the more traditional paths in finding jobs seem to work best.

"I put less faith in job listings online than with personal contacts," she said.

"There's a much higher success rate that way. The Internet is a good way to research jobs you would like to do, and those sites often have good advice for résumés and interviews, but they are hit-and-miss in actual positions. Often those are high turnover or highly skilled positions."

LIFETIME MEMORIES

Memories equal success in college

I am a K-State has-been.

Once graduation is done and over on Saturday morning, I cannot call myself a K-State student, or a senior in print journalism or anything of the sort anymore.

Because I won't be.

And I don't really want to be called an alumnae. It sounds too old and too impersonal.

I prefer to be called a has-been. I think that label makes it seem more like I have been here and done something.

Maybe it means that I have left my mark on K-State. Or maybe not.

But I think that I have, in some way or another, er, made some sort of an impact on this campus during my time here.

JAMIE BARRETT

Maybe it has been through my work at the Collegian, which has largely defined me during my college experience.

The first building I visited on the K-State campus was Kedzie Hall when I came in as a meek little freshman for the semiannual staff meeting one week before classes began.

And since Kedzie has been my home away from home for all of my four years at K-State, I bet that it will be the last building I visit while I am a student here.

And for all that time spent, I am grateful. The Collegian has done a lot for me while I have been here.

Eight long semesters (and one stress-filled summer) has helped out my résumé immensely, produced some great stories that I will always remember covering and has even helped me find a fiancé, thanks to one 21-year-old turning ex-editor.

So I guess the Collegian is how I have made my mark on K-State.

And I am proud of that.

Although it gets criticized for this and for that, the Collegian is a good newspaper. We consistently win national awards and even though some may not understand it, the people who work at the Collegian are some of the most hardworking people on campus.

But I don't mean to make this a sentimental rant. I don't think that is what graduation is about. I would much rather celebrate in Aggieville with my friends on Saturday night than sit at home and reminisce about all the times had. And don't worry, I plan to do the former.

But right now I have the opportunity to let K-State and all the people who have affected me during my time here know how much my college experience has meant to me.

Having these memories is how I am leaving my mark on K-State.

If I didn't have anything to think back on or sit and say, "I remember when" about, I don't think that I would have had a successful college career.

But in retrospect, I know that I have had my good times and my bad times.

I have had some successes and some failures.

I have made some friends and lost some friends.

I have smiled some smiles and shed some tears.

I have been in love and then stayed in love.

So that is where I am at right now. Staring down the future and not really knowing what lies ahead of me.

But to me, that is exciting. It is what moving on in life is all about.

And I am ready to get out of here. My K-State years have been great and successful and will be missed, but I am ready to be a has-been and leave my mark somewhere else.

Jamie is a has-been in print journalism. She will still continue to check her e-mail at jamie7@k-state.edu.

Bars teach more than books

It's a sad day.

Well at least I'm trying to convince myself it is.

This is the last byline I'll ever have in the Collegian.

Unless of course I graduate next weekend and find myself jobless and broke.

Then I might come back, but I wouldn't hold your breath for that to happen.

It's taken me five years to get here. Five years of long nights, impossible tests, terrible hangovers and some laughs as well.

So what have I learned?

I can't speak Spanish after four semesters of classes. I can't recite pi (although I have a friend who's getting close). I can't remember the difference between refraction and reflection, although I'm pretty sure it has to do with light.

But the point is, I'm still better off then when I got here.

I can manage money

This isn't saying much since it doesn't take a genius to figure out that the $2 in my checking account isn't going to get me much more than a Bud Light at O'Malleys. But living as a poor college student taught me a lesson I hope everyone learns soon - money doesn't buy happiness.

I've discovered as long as I have friends - and sometimes booze - I am a happy camper. There are some things in life you need money for - rent, utilities, peanut butter and jelly and beer. And then there are the things you think you need, but don't. You'll be happier if you just forget those things exist.

I can juggle a million things at once

No, not like tennis balls or bowling pins (that I can't do). But I can juggle work, school, Collegian and still maintain somewhat of a social life. Is this a big deal? Of course it is. While everyone else was at home cramming for a test the next day, I was at my favorite bar thinking about studying. And I still did well, which has a tendency of pissing some over-achievers off.

So take a lesson from me - if you're bright and care even the least bit, you will do well in school. They say you should study for three hours a week for each hour you spend in class. Are you kidding me? That might be more studying than I did in a semester.

I can interact with people

This only applies, of course, when I want to. I can talk the talk with the best of the professionals in the world. But I can also carry on a philosophical conversation about life when the time calls for it. But one of the best lessons I learned about dealing with people was from one of my favorite red heads and my roommate - sometimes being polite isn't the answer.

When a drunk, and often creepy guy, hits on you at the bar and you're not interested, you have to turn a cold shoulder. Or in my case, walk away and maybe shoot the guy one of the evil looks that I give, which have been known to bring some people to tears (just ask my other favorite red head).

I know what's important in life

Yes, waking up with a big, red zit on your face sucks, but is that really what's most important in life? I would give that a big, fat thumbs down. I spent a long time thinking tests, grades and every other small thing was worth giving myself an ulcer over. In the end, does it matter if I have one D on my transcript? Yes, it stinks. It broke my heart for a while. But then I had a few beers and had one of those philosophical conversations. A friend once told me the point of life is to be happy, and enjoy what you do. So from this point on, be assured that's what I'll be doing.

So it's been a long, and sometimes fuzzy, trip through college. But I've thrown out all the textbooks Varney's wouldn't buy back from me, and I'm not looking back.

I'm taking my $2, interpersonal skills and work experience and getting out of here. The real world awaits, and I'm sure it's more scared of me than I am of it. At least it should be.

April is a senior in print journalism. You can e-mail her at amiddle@k-state.edu.

JOURNALIST GETS TO SHARE OPINIONS

Collegian reporter reflects on stories

I have taken great pride in the fact that my news stories in the Collegian were objective.

I shared others' opinions.

I shared their thoughts, their feelings.

I shared their hatred and love.

But never my own. Never have I told my opinion on the stories I covered. But today, the last day my name appears in the Collegian, I will speak out on a few issues.

War protest

Before I begin, let me explain the difference between a NEWS story and an OPINION piece.

It's an obvious difference — news stories appear on every page of a newspaper except for the Opinion page (Page 4). They do not reflect the views of the newspaper or the reporter.

Opinion pieces appear on ... drumroll please ... the Opinion page. They are the view of the writer — only the writer, not the newspaper, not the rest of the staff and most importantly, not the editor in chief.

That said, the NEWS story I wrote on the pro-war protesters was not my opinion. I simply reported what was happening in the Union Plaza the day of the anti-war protest. Stay with me now — pro-war protesters were outside the Union protesting the war protest. I covered it. It was the story I was assigned.

JESSICA PITTS

Again, not my opinion, but thank you for all the e-mails praising me for my "active" stance on supporting the war.

Ashleigh Banfield

As a high-profile journalist, she should be my hero.

To me, she is just a pretty face who happened to be at the right place at the right time. Banfield, in my opinion, is riding the 9-11 wave of popularity.

Pre-Sept. 11, 2001, the nation had never heard of the MSNBC reporter, but when the towers came crashing down that day, she was on the scene to cover it (with blond hair, I might add).

Kudos for that — the American people heard wonderful minute-by-minute coverage.

But now, sporting dark hair and fashionable glasses, she is traveling the world, had her own show and has made numerous guest appearances.

Recently, she was the guest speaker at a Landon Lecture.

She gave a good speech. It was exactly what the audience wanted to hear — the coverage of the war wasn't complete. This may be true, but I believe Banfield crossed a line when she criticized journalists' coverage of the war, particularly the journalists who were on the front line. She was not there. She did not risk her life to tell a story.

I believe those journalists should be praised.

SGA elections

The rich man wins. Always.

Sure, on the surface we have a democratic system that allows all students to decide who will represent them for the next year.

But dig a little deeper, and voters quickly realize that their lone votes never can compare to the hundreds of sorority and fraternity votes the winning candidate picks up from his or her affiliation. Nor can the other candidates compete with the high budget (translate into lots of posters, T-shirts, pens, buttons, etc.) of the rich candidate.

Student Governing Association should set a smaller limit on the amount of money the presidential candidates can spend on their campaigns. I know steps have been taken in the past, but the cap is still high.

If SGA set a lower limit, it would even the playing field and give all candidates a chance to share their platforms.

Seems simple enough, but the chances of it happening are slim.

To set a lower amount would mean senators would have to vote favorably to the resolution. But why would they? It is the high cap that has allowed a majority of them to be elected to office.

Hunter, Kan.

This small town in Mitchell County won my heart.

A Collegian photographer (who I soon found out was a little nuts because she bought two pigeons while in Hunter) and I loaded up the car one Saturday morning in November to make a trip to the town. We were hoping to report on a common problem in the Midwest — the dying of small communities.

While this town was facing the dilemma, the story we found was completely different.

The 90-some townspeople, maybe closer to 125 during the holidays, loved their community. They are determined to save their town.

So to them, I want to say thank you. Thank you for opening my eyes to a different kind of life.

As Nicole, the pigeons and I drove home that day, we felt better knowing that Small Town, America, is still alive and well.

And with that, I end. I have said my piece and feel a little bit better. However, after sharing my opinion with 12,000-plus readers, I am ready to go back to being objective — it is so much easier.

Jessica will check her mail occasionally at jpitts@ksu.edu because she is sure somebody will disagree with her opinion.

University ring a traditional jewelry item for seniors to purchase, receive as gifts

By Katie Copeland
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Tradition is what it is all about.

As students prepare to graduate and leave behind their college experience, they can carry a piece K-State's tradition with them.

Before 2001, K-State students could be found with different class rings, but no tradition. Today, the university offers a single ring program designed to "build the tradition and affinity," Brad Sidener, vice-president of finance and administration for the K-State Alumni Association, said.

The single ring program was first introduced two years ago after a committee of student leaders, alumni and university administrators collaborated to design and develop the ring program.

"The pattern has developed that single rings sell more," Sidener said.

In what has become a national trend, the single ring concept offers one ring for all of the university's colleges in order to create a visible bond among all K-State students, he said.

While the ring has a standard design distinct to K-State, students have a variety of choices for their own rings.

Available in 10 karat, 14 karat, or 18 karat yellow or white gold with an antique or natural finish, the rings may be purchased with either a diamond, synthetic amethyst or cubic zirconia stone on top.

To purchase a ring, students must first qualify by either earning 60 credit hours from K-State - 90 hours for transfer students - or obtain any degree from the university.

"You must qualify to be able to wear the ring - to carry the distinction with you," Sidener said.

Produced by ArtCarved, the ring ranges in price from $309 to $769, depending on the size, quality and stone. The ring is also offered in both men's and women's styles.

While the rings are designed to create unity among all K-State students and alumni, students and alumni from the College of Veterinary Medicine have not been able to purchase rings that distinguish their degree.

Both students and faculty of the College of Veterinary Medicine have had several class meetings with unanimous requests for a design recognizing the college.

Ralph Richardson, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the Alumni Association has approved artwork to "demonstrate more symmetrically spaced letters" of DVM in place of the traditional BS degree on the side of the ring.

Richardson said the ring would also feature a shank with the emblem of veterinary medicine, aesculapius.

63-year-old graduate accredits success to dedication, attitude

Grandmother returns to school to earn degree

By April Middleton
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

After 45 years, Diana Clark is graduating. It has required determination, dedication and a can-do attitude, she said.

But it will all be worth it when she walks to the stage to receive her degree at commencement exercises in a week.

Clark, 63, is graduating with a degree in family life and community services.

She started school at K-State in 1957 to study elementary education.

She met her husband there, and then they moved so he could pursue his doctorate at Purdue University.

Clark didn't attend school there because it didn't have a satisfactory program for her to study, she said.

Then she started a family.

"It was a full-time job," she said.

Now, five daughters, 14 grandchildren and one great-grandchild later, Clark is finishing the degree she started decades ago.

"It's a goal I started so long ago, and I have accomplished most of my goals," she said. "I have a ranch style home, raised a family of upstanding citizens, and I've volunteered everywhere I could."

"I found myself wondering where to go next. And this is where I am."

Clark said one of her biggest motivations for coming back to school was so she could be an advocate for the mentally ill and battered women.

That desire stems from a very personal and difficult family situation.

Clark's daughter was a battered wife for about 20 years.

Clark said by the time her daughter finally got out of the situation, she had very deeply rooted fear and trust problems.

These problems, Clark said, led her to have a total breakdown.

"I became so wrapped up in her life and started to get depressed," she said. "I knew that wasn't my personality, and I needed to do something for myself."

That was three years ago. Finishing her degree hasn't been easy, she said, but it has been a rewarding learning experience.

"I have had to work harder at retaining stuff," Clark said.

"I learn different than today's kids do, because I don't have the background that they do. So to compensate, I study a few more hours."

Even that, though, isn't as easy as it seems.

Clark finds herself very busy.

She said things such as sewing a wedding dress for her granddaughter and sending out birthday cards are still important to her.

"My home life doesn't stop," she said. "I can't just turn off my family."

Most of Clark's family will be in Manhattan next weekend to help her celebrate an accomplishment that means more to Clark than she said she is even able to describe sometimes.

"Where there is a will there is a way," Clark said.

"Some classes have been challenging, and it's not been easy, but I can almost breathe a little easier."

Upon graduation, Clark said she wants to use her degree to help people who are in similar situations as her daughter and her family.

"I can relate to that," she said. "I understand the needs of the mentally ill and battered, because we are living through it. I could be a great spokesman."

And, Clark said, even at 63, she thinks there are many things she can still do.

"I feel like there are a wealth of things I could work at," she said. "I have 20 good years on me yet."

Those years will be lived knowing that she finished what was important to her. And knowing that against many odds she completed her degree. She said she will live easier knowing that she has set a good example for her children, grandchildren and even great-grandchildren.

"One of my goals is that my obit will read that Diana Clark graduated from KSU," Clark said.

"That's how important I think an education is. It was against all odds for me to graduate, but it's never too late. I'm not too late."

Graduation gifts include memorabilia, practical items

By Abbie Whited
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Graduation is coming up, and some students aren't sure if they'll be receiving gifts.

"I would hope I get a graduation gift," David Dover, senior in marketing, said.

"I asked for a digital camera. Whether or not I get it, who knows?"

Dover said he is pretty sure his mother and his brother will at least give him something for graduation.

"My mom and brother may go in together and buy me something," he said.

"And I may even get gifts from some of my aunts and uncles. They might give me a little bit of money."

Dover said he thinks most students do receive graduation gifts.

"I think most people get at least something for graduation," he said. "Those students that don't get anything might feel a little disappointed."

Graduating students should receive gifts because they have earned them, Dover said.

"We deserve something for all the effort and work we have put in," he said. "Gifts can help us in adjusting to the real world."

Carolyn Rose, assistant manager of soft goods at the K-State Student Union Bookstore, said most customers purchase graduation gifts that represent the university.

"People want something with the K-State logo on it," she said. "I think they do it so the graduate will have a memento from the university they graduated from."

Rose said picture frames are one of the most popular items purchased for graduation.

"We have all different sizes and kinds. People like frames for their diplomas," she said. "We also have frames with an area for the diploma and an area for the graduation announcement. Those are real nice."

The bookstore also sells a lot of jewelry, etched glass, pens and pen sets, Rose said.

"Tie clasps and business card holders are very popular," she said.

"So is any etched glass, such as wine glasses or mugs."

Rose said the bookstore doesn't personalize any items.

"The etching is already on the glassware. Most people purchase items with the Powercat logo on them," she said. "People also like items that say they are a K-State alumnus."

Rose said a popular item for men is the alumni license plate frame.

"We have items in almost every price range," she said.

While graduation gifts could be of any price, Dover said gifts should be practical.

"A good gift idea would be money to buy new work clothes," he said.

"Graduation gifts are similar to wedding gifts - they're supposed to help you in your new life."

Paul Houston, senior in illustration, said he agrees that graduation gifts should be practical.

"As a parent, I would probably give my children something like a car or new clothes - something to help them out in the future," he said.

As far as gifts for himself when he graduates this month, Houston said he's not sure if he'll be receiving any.

"I didn't really ask for anything," he said. "I don't know if my wife has anything planned for me."

Although he's not sure if he'll receive any material objects as gifts, Houston said he knows he is getting one special gift.

"My junior high art teacher will be at my graduation when I walk, and that's a big deal for me," he said.

Houston said he has maintained a friendship with his teacher for many years.

"She's been very supportive of me. She's probably more excited than I am," he said. "It means a lot to me that she'll be there."

Two of Houston's children will be graduating the same day he does - one from elementary school and one from junior high, he said.

"We'll definitely have a big barbecue for all our friends and family to celebrate our graduations," he said.

"My daughter has a trip to Worlds of Fun planned for the same day I graduate, so right after graduation we'll all get in the car and drive there to celebrate."

CES provides services to help graduates find jobs

By Kecia Seyb
KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

If you're still looking for a job, Career and Employment Services may be able to help.

CES provides many of its services for free, like résumé building and critiquing, and helping students to learn skills of job interviewing, Dottie Evans, assistant director of CES, said.

"We can do specific job searches based on either their degree, their skills or interests, the kind of organization they want to work in or the kind of geography they want to live in. Those are all important parts in the job search," she said.

These services are available to alumni as well as students, Evans said. Alumni are always welcome to come back for career fairs or on-campus job interviews. Sometimes CES brings more than 200 companies for on-campus job interviews, and the All-University Career Fair in September will bring more than 300 exhibitors.

"I hope all the graduating seniors have a job by then," she said, "but as an alumnus, they could still come back."

Although two-thirds of CES's services are free, it costs $30 for one year to post resumes and have access to jobs on its Web site, and to tap into on-campus interviews. That $30 is well worth all the benefits students receive, said Andrew Bell, graduating senior in management information systems.

"Even though it does cost, I think $30, you're looking at a potential career avenue," he said. "If you look at the cost of it compared to a job down the road, it's very beneficial and very cost effective."

Bell registered with CES his freshman year, went to the All-University Career Fair all four years and attended several on-campus job interviews. Checking in on CES's Web site, www.ksu.edu/ces, once a week, Bell said he could update his résumé and research which companies offered what he wanted. He also could schedule a time for interviews directly on the Web site.

Last summer, he took an internship with Koch Industries, which led to a job offer. Cerner Corporation and Exxon Mobile offered him jobs, too. But Bell took the job with Exxon Mobile. He said CES is extremely helpful.

"They're very beneficial to students," he said. "Your freshman year, you don't really know what's going on - it's worth it to register with them. I did interviews my freshman year to get practice."

Evans said she just wants students to take advantage of all the services CES offers right at their fingertips.

"It's a way of getting them launched and getting their motivation up to take on the challenging job market," she said. "We do want to help them find a job."
